Waiver by wrongful claim to detain.—It is now to be considered how the lien may be waived by the conduct of the attorney when possession is demanded. The cases arising upon other species of lien will throw light upon this subject, but in some points they are not altogether satisfactory. A lien will be waived if, on the demand of possession, no claim of lien is set up, but a claim of actual property. (Boardman v. Sill, 1 Camp. 410, n.) So where the ground of refusal is that the right of property is in a third party, and that the holder has a general lien for expenses against that party (Knight v. Harrison, referred to in Scarfe v. Morgan, 4 M. & W. 270), or where detention is for the debt of a third party. (Dirks v. Richards, 5 Sc. N. R. 534; 4 M. & Gr.) The circumstances of this last case were these:—

A left a picture, which was his property, in the rooms of C, who was an auctioneer. B was in company with A, when he went to C's rooms with the picture. B owed C 8*l.* and had advanced A some money upon the picture in question. When A wanted his picture back again, and offered to pay for the warehouse-room, C said the cost of keeping the picture was 5s. but that he would not deliver it up unless he was paid B's debts in addition to that sum. Alderson, B. said at Nisi Prius (1 C. & Mars. 626) that the lien for warehouse-room was clearly waived, and the Court of Common Pleas confirmed this view.

But there seems some discrepancy in the cases as to the effect of demanding more than is actually due. In Scarfe v. Morgan (4 M. & W. 270) the defendant being entitled to a specific lien upon a mare for the charge of covering her by his stallion, refused to deliver her up without payment of this specific lien, and also a further sum due for covering other mares, under a supposed right of general lien. The Court of Exchequer held that, under these circumstances, there was no waiver of the lien for the smaller sum, nor dispensation of tender, and that nothing having been tendered, the plaintiff was not entitled to recover in trover. Parke, B. said, after distinguishing Boardman v. Sill and Knight v. Harrison:—

"In this case it would be strange to say that the defendant meant to waive his lien of the 11s. when that was one of the things he said he would hold the mare for; and it would be equally strange to say that he meant to excuse the tender of that sum, when no tender was made of any sum at all. I do not mean to say that such circumstances may not occur as would amount to the waiver of a lien of the tender, but that a great deal more must have passed than was proved to have passed on the present occasion. If he had said, 'You need not trouble yourself to make a tender of the sum for which I have a lien; I shall claim to hold the mare for it,' the plaintiff would then be in the same situation as if a tender had been made; but we think the defendant cannot be deprived of his right of holding the property on which he had a lien by any thing that has passed on the present occasion."

And Alderson, B. said:—

"It seems to me a monstrous proposition to say that a party who claims in respect of two sums to detain a mare is to be supposed to have waived his right to detain her as to one. * * You cannot say, because the party claims more than it may be ultimately found he had a right to, he would not have a right to a tender of the sum which the other ought to pay."

But in Jones v. Tarleton (9 M. & W. 675), in trover against a carrier who claimed to retain a cargo for freight due for former cargoes, under a right which he failed to establish, the judge at Nisi Prius told the jury that if they thought the plaintiff was ready to pay all that was really due from him, but did not pay it because the defendant demanded something more, that was sufficient, without tender or payment of the specific sum. The Court of Exchequer held that the direction was quite correct—that it amounted to this, that if "the defendant refused to deliver the pigs until payment of the old account, which he had no right to demand, that was a waiver of the express tender." Alderson, B. said the conduct of the defendant was equivalent to saying to the plaintiff:—

"'Do what you will, tender what you will, it is of no use, I will not receive it unless you pay the old account also.' It would have been different if the defendant had merely demanded too large a sum in respect of the same subject-matter; in that case, the plaintiff would, perhaps, have been bound to tender a reasonable sum before he could have been entitled to the possession of the goods demanded."

Scarfe v. Halifax (7 M. & W. 288), and Ashmole v. Wainwright (2 Q. B. 837) may also be examined to elucidate this point. In the former case, in an action against the sheriff for money paid to obtain goods seized under a fi. fa. and upon which the sheriff claimed more than was due, it was held that there was no occasion to tender the sum actually due before payment under protest of the sum claimed. In the last case the defendants, carriers, had refused to deliver goods except upon payment of an exorbitant sum. The plaintiffs had objected to the amount claimed, but ultimately, without any tender of a smaller sum, paid the whole, and brought assumpsit for money had and received, and recovered the amount of the overcharge. We think the judgment of Patteson, J. will guide us to the true principle to be adopted in cases of lien.

"I am not prepared to go the length of saying that where a party simply denies that any thing is due, then pays, and afterwards sues for the whole sum, he may turn round at the trial and recover part, for his objection to the whole would be like a deception. In this case, therefore, had there been nothing to shew that the plaintiff ever demanded less than to have the goods without any payment, according to his first claim, I should hardly have said that the action would be maintainable. But, on the further conversation and the subsequent applications, an allegation of overcharge is added to the at first total denial; the defendants always demanded the whole; the plaintiff did not altogether insist that nothing at all was due—then the particulars of demand distinctly shew that the action was brought not merely to recover the whole but to recover the part overcharged, if the plaintiff was liable at all."

From the examination of the cases, the inference seems to be, that if the circumstances under which the owner of the deeds claimed their possession shew that he admitted no debt to be due, and was unwilling to pay any lien, there the lien would not be waived by a demand, on the part of the holder, to retain them for more than was actually due. But if they shewed the owner's willingness to pay the just claim, such an excessive demand would dispense with a tender of the smaller sum. The observation of Coleridge, J. in Ashmole v. Wainwright, that the true amount lay particularly in the knowledge of the carriers, would apply most strongly to an attorney, as the client cannot be supposed to know the nature or amount of the sums due from him for business done under a general retainer. Such a rule as we have above laid down seems entirely consonant with justice and fair dealing. It is, however, open to the objection, that the client has the opportunity in every case of ascertaining the amount of the bill by obtaining an order for taxation. To this it may be answered, that the necessity for the possession of the deeds may be urgent, and the process of taxation would be long, and that a different rule would give the attorney the power of retaining the deeds for an indefinite time, by the simple mode of demanding very much more than the sum due, for, although the client would undoubtedly be entitled to recover back the amount overpaid, it would be against the policy of the law to encourage actions by laying down a rule which the precedents do not establish, and which can benefit none but the dishonest. We think that our view is supported by Cooper v. Hewison (2 Y. & Coll. C. C. 514), where a client had discharged his solicitor in the course of a cause, and the solicitor not having within a month delivered his bill, he was held entitled to an order for the delivery of the papers to his new solicitor without payment of any money on account of the lien.

It is, however, quite clear that the lien is not waived by a simple refusal, without any mention of the claim at all. (White v. Gainer, 2 Bing. 23; Owen v. Knight, 4 B. N. C. 54.)

Lien, how lost.—It follows from the very nature of the right of lien that it will only exist while there is possession of the chattels subject to the lien; consequently, by a sale the lien would be lost, and the owner entitled to bring trover for money had and received (Clark v. Gilbert, 2 B. N. C. 353); and no tender of the amount once due on the lien would of course be necessary. (Jones v. Cliff, 1 Cr. & M. 540.) He might also bring trover against the party who received the chattels through such wrongful conversion of the person entitled to the lien. (Scott v. Newington, 1 Moo. & R. 252.) Lord Chancellor Sugden, in his judgment in Blunden v. Desart (2 Dr. & War. 405), said that he did not see how Ex parte Morgan (12 Ves. 6) could be reconciled with the other cases on the subject. There a solicitor, having a lien, refused to deliver the deeds of an estate to the assignees of his debtor. It was then put up for sale, and bought by one of the assignees for a less sum than the amount claimed by the solicitor, who then delivered to him the deeds, upon receiving a portion of his lien. The assignee subsequently sold the estate for a greater sum, and the solicitor petitioned to be allowed his lien, on the ground that the sale was void in law, from the inability of the assignee to purchase. On the hearing, Lord Eldon was plainly inclined against the claim, on account of the lien having been parted with by the solicitor with his eyes open. He ultimately, however, decided, that, under the circumstances, he was entitled to the lien against the general creditors, the assignee having treated his own purchase and subsequent resale as on account of the estate. After the cases more recently decided, we do not think this can be supported. The relinquishment of possession may be constructive or actual. In Sweet v. Pym (1 E. 4), a fuller, having a general lien upon goods, delivered them to a ship carrier, to be conveyed on account and at the risk of the owner; and it was held that he could not recover his lien by stopping the goods in transitu, although the carrier did not know for whom he carried them, and in the course of the voyage the fuller had procured from him a bill of lading, by virtue of which he obtained repossession of the goods. So the person entitled to the lien could not cause the papers (supposing them to be liable under 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110) to be taken in execution at his own suit, although they were never actually removed from his premises, for by the seizure the possession became vested in the sheriff. (Jacobs v. Latour, 5 Bing. 130.) On this principle, what is detained by virtue of a lien cannot be seized in execution against the party detaining, for the sheriff can only sell what the judgment debtor can (Legg v. Evans, 6 M. & W. 36); and we have seen he cannot retain the lien, and part with the deeds. If, however, the papers are wrongfully taken out of his possession, the attorney would not lose his lien. (Dicas v. Stockley, 7 C. & P. 587.)

It is not barred by the Statute of Limitations. (Spears v. Hartley, 3 Esp. 81.) This is consistent with the principle that a debt is not barred by lapse of time, but only the remedy; and a lien is not a remedy to enforce payment. Its efficacy solely depends upon the importance of the papers detained. It is not lost by issuing an attachment; for that is not like an execution, but only a process of the Court to punish a contempt of its jurisdiction. (Davies v. Bush, 1 Young, 358.)

Effect of taking security.—So far the law is tolerably clear; but, although we have examined this subject with considerable attention, we cannot say that the question which we shall now discuss can be considered as settled. By proving his debt under a commission, and acting under it, the lien would be lost. (Ex parte Solomon, 1 Glyn's J. 25.) But what is the consequence of taking a negotiable instrument or a bond for the amount due on the lien?

By giving a negotiable instrument, payable at a distant day, the client confers a right of action. The attorney cannot sue for his costs until the instrument is due; the debt is suspended for that time—the personal credit of the client is relied on. And in Cowell v. Simpson (16 Ves. 275) Lord Eldon distinctly held that the client was entitled to demand the possession of the papers, when, as in that case, the instruments were still running, and the remedies for the debt consequently still in suspense. He indeed went further, and said that it would make no difference whether they had become due, and been dishonoured or not. In Stevenson v. Blakelock (1 M. & Sel. 534) the Court of Queen's Bench seemed inclined to doubt the decision as well as the dictum, but it was only necessary to act in opposition to the latter, as there the securities had been dishonoured, and they held that the attorney was remitted to his original lien. Lord Eldon's decision, however, may be considered as right, for in Hewison v. Guthrie (2 B.N.C.) the Court of Common Pleas distinctly laid down, that "it is well established by the authorities that if a security is taken for the debt for which the party has a lien upon property of that debtor, such security being payable at a distant day, the lien is gone." This is laid down in wide terms, but in fact the security had not become due. The question of revival of the lien upon non-payment is not then settled by it. We have indeed the authority of Lord Eldon, before quoted, and to which he expressed his adherence, notwithstanding Stevenson v. Blakelock, in Balch v. Symes (1 Turn. & Russ. 87). In this last case it is not distinctly stated that the securities had become due, but there can be little doubt of it, as they were bonds given in 1815 and 1817, and the suit was not brought until 1822. On the one hand, it may be said that as there may be concurrent remedies at law, it would be strange that a lien should be destroyed because a single remedy is obtained; that it is not a simple contract, which would be merged by taking a higher security; for the doctrine of merger only applies to causes of action; that admitting that, pending the securities, the client is entitled to the possession of the papers, his nonclaimer before the securities are dishonoured is equivalent to a redelivery of them to the attorney after the dishonour; and then, as an action upon the bill of costs might still be brought without regard to the dishonoured securities, there is no distinction between the respective positions of the parties, then and at the time the securities were given. Moreover, according to Whitehead v. Vaughan (quoted as law in Levy v. Barnard, 8 Taunt. 149), an insurance-broker who has a general lien will, after parting with the policies, regain his lien by obtaining repossession of them, even by false pretences; and that lien would therefore be still more reasonable in the case now put. And, lastly, that by analogy with the lien of vendors of real estates, taking security does not bar the lien.

In answer, it may be said that such a general lien is not to be favoured, that it is only of recent establishment, for Lord Mansfield once argued the question (see Cowell v. Simpson), that the analogy with the lien of vendors is not appropriate. That there the lien is founded upon natural equity and justice, the purchaser is bound to give value for his purchase, and is governed by wholly different rules, for example, not depending upon possession. That even this lien was once held to be waived by taking a security (Fawell v. Heelis, Ambl. 724), although now settled that a mere bond or note will not affect it. Yet, even now, taking a distinct security as a mortgage of part of the estate sold, or of another, would destroy the vendor's lien (see 3 Sugden, Vend. & Purch. 182). That the doctrine of lien has always been considered peculiarly a subject of judicial decision; and although in the civil law it was not lost by change of possession even in the case of goods sold, it was by taking any security. That the opinion of Lord Eldon is entitled to great weight, and that it is quoted without dissent by Lord Chancellor Sugden in Blunden v. Desart; that the attorney who takes such a security does it for some supposed additional benefit, and certainly gains the advantage of rendering it more difficult for the client to tax his bill; and that the case of Whitehead v. Vaughan stands almost solitary, and is certainly at variance with Sweet v. Pym (1 E. 4), which was also a case of general lien. It might further be argued, that specific liens, which were much more favoured, clearly did not re-vest on repossession (see Jones v. Pearte, 1 Str. 556; Hartley v. Hitchcock, 1 Stark. 401); and that such a general lien as that of an attorney, which is not, like that of brokers and factors, advantageous to trade and commerce, is not to be favoured. We should, on the whole, be inclined to draw a distinction between the case of a negotiable instrument—a mere simple contract debt—and a bond, and to say that in the former case the lien would only be suspended, and in the latter lost. The bond is a much more efficient security, as it entitles the obligor to priority in the administration of the debtor's property; and it would also be much more difficult to obtain taxation of a bill after a bond had been given for the amount; and on account of this difference the courts would be inclined, we think, to adhere to Lord Eldon's decision in Balch v. Symes (1 Tur. & Russ. 87). We have thought it right to treat thus at length of this subject, as the text-books lay it down far too authoritatively; and a minute examination of the subject has satisfied us, that both the effect of taking a bill and a bond is still doubtful.

We shall, in a future article, consider the more limited lien arising from the employment of an attorney or solicitor in a cause.

I. MORTMAIN—POLICY OF ASSURANCE.

A point of considerable importance is reported in the last number of BEAVAN. It arose in the case of MARCH v. THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL.

(Reported 5 Beavan, 433.)

The facts were these:—Mary Barfield bequeathed the residue of her moneys, securities for money, and her other personal estate to certain charities.

This residue consisted, partly of policies of assurance, the companies granting which were entitled to real estate, or chattels real, or some funds secured on mortgages of real estate or chattels real, and out of the stock and funds so invested or secured the policies were paid.

Upon this the question was raised, whether the policies providing that the directors should pay "out of the funds" of their several companies, and those funds, consisting partly of real estate, the policies were so connected with land as, under the Mortmain Act, to render invalid the gift of them to charity.

In support of the bequest, it was argued by Pemberton, Metcalfe, Teed, and Rolt, that real estate belonging to a trading company was personal property, and would pass by a will not executed with the formalities required for devising real estate. That policies are merely personal obligations; that moneys due on a policy are bona notabilia where the insured died, and the policy was, and not where the fund was, out of which it is payable; that the covenant to the extent of assets of a company is similar to the limited covenant of an individual: citing Bligh v. Brent (2 You. & C. 268); Andrews v. Ellison (6 Moore, 199); Gurney v. Rawlins (2 M. & W. 87); Howse v. Chapman (4 Ves. 542).

It was argued by Turner and Sturton, for the next of kin, that the statute 9 Geo. 2, c. 36, passed to prevent the disherison of lawful heirs, strictly prohibits the charging of real estate for charitable uses "in any ways;" that the stream of cases shewed the inclination of the courts strictly to enforce the statute; citing Negus v. Coulter (Amb. 367); Knapp v. Williams (4 Ves. 430, n.); Finch v. Squire (10 Ves. 41); Harrison v. Harrison (1 Russ. & M. 71); Collinson v. Pater (2 Russ. & Myl. 344); R. v. Bates (3 Price, 341); Hobson v. Blackburn (1 Keen, 273).

The Master of the Rolls held the charitable bequest to be good. His commentary on the Mortmain Act deserves particular attention. He said:

"The grantees of the policies contract for a sum of money to be paid on a future event. Whatever may be the property possessed by the grantors, the grantees have not, by their contract, any immediate control over it or lien upon it. The grantors or their trustees continue to have the entire control or management over the whole fund; the real estate or chattels real may be sold and converted into pure personalty, and the pure personalty may be converted into chattels real. This state of things may continue, not only during the contingency upon which payment depends, but after the contingency has determined; for the grantee acquires no specific lien after the payment has become due. Even in default of payment when due, the grantee cannot, by reason of such default only, resort immediately and at once to land or chattels real, but must resort to legal process, which will not affect the land possessed by the office at the time of the contract, although it may, in its final result, affect such land as the office may have at the time when the process is executed. Ordinarily, the grantee has nothing but a right of action from the date of the contract until actual payment; and although I conceive it to be possible for circumstances to arise, in which, from the state of the funds, the claims upon it, and the misconduct of trustees and directors, the Court would take possession of the property, and apply it for the benefit of all persons having claims upon it, yet I conceive that the bare possibility of such interference, within the meaning of the Mortmain Act, does not connect a sum of money payable on a policy of insurance with the quality of the property which may be held by the grantors. The cases which have been decided have gone a great length in bringing money held on securities which affect real estate within the meaning of the Mortmain Act; but none of them go so far as is attempted in this case. Where there is a right to have turnpike tolls, or poor-rates, or county-rates specifically applied in payment of a mortgage, the money so secured has been held within the Mortmain Act. There are other cases which have scarcely met with approbation; but this case does not appear to come within the Act, or within any of the decided authorities; and it seems, that if the money secured by a policy of assurance is to be deemed to be connected with land so as to be brought within the Statute of Mortmain, there would be no reason why the same consequence should not attach upon any debt, owing by any person who has real estate or chattels real; for though the right of action imports only pure personalty, yet the result of an action may be to obtain payment out of the land or chattels real."

LEGAL INTELLIGENCE.

LAW INSTITUTION, CHANCERY-LANE.

The annual meeting of the society, directed by the charter to be held on the first Tuesday in the month of June, or as soon after as conveniently may be, was summoned by the committee of management, and held on Tuesday last. The only reason given by the committee of management in their report to the Court, read at the meeting, for their not having sooner called the meeting was, that they had been endeavouring (in order to prevent a dividend being declared under it), to surrender the old charter, but which they were now prevented from surrendering by an injunction granted against them by Vice-Chancellor Knight Bruce.

Mr. B. Holme, of New Inn, moved that Mr. E. Foss (of the Law Life Insurance), and described in the proposed new charter, of Streatham, in the county of Surrey, should be called to the chair. This was seconded by Mr. William Lowe, of the Temple.

It was objected to the meeting that Mr. Foss having been struck off the roll of attorneys upon his own affidavit, that he had retired from the profession of an attorney, was no longer a member of the society declared by the charter to have been instituted for facilitating the acquisition of legal knowledge, and for the better and more convenient discharge by the members of their professional duties, the society being also incorporated as the Society of Attorneys practising, &c.; and that though it was declared that persons who had practised and voluntarily retired might become members in the earlier part of the charter, yet that "having retired" did not there mean struck off the rolls, and that the 11th section of the charter expressly provided, that in case any person holding any share or shares in the society shall, in consequence of the order of any court of competent judicature, be rendered incapable of practising, such person shall forthwith cease to be a proprietor of the society, but may sell his shares to any person willing and qualified, under the provisions of the charter, to become a proprietor; and in support of this, the opinion of Mr. Charles Austin, the parliamentary counsel, taken upon a case settled by the secretary of the society, Mr. Maugham, was read to the meeting, the opinion of Mr. C. Austin being, that Mr. Foss having, by the rule of Court of the 4th of May, 1841, been rendered incapable of practising in the Court of Common Pleas, had ceased to be a proprietor, no distinction being drawn in the 11th clause of the charter between an order of Court procured by the party himself and an adverse order, and that the case of Mr. Foss fell precisely within the words of the clause. It was also pressed on the meeting, that if Mr. Foss, not being a member, was put in the chair, the meeting would be a nullity, and the re-election of the six members of the committee of management proposed for re-election a void election, and so that this might be considered by the Court of Chancery as an intentional surrender of the charter which was restrained by its injunction.

Mr. Foss's friends from the Club and the Law Life prevailed, and he was placed in the chair.

Mr. Foss, as chairman, then proposed Mr. Bryan Holme, who had placed him there, and four other members of the committee of management, for re-election, and declared them re-elected.

Mr. Foss then, as chairman, proposed himself for re-election on the committee of management.

Mr. Preston (of the late firm of Tilson and Preston), who at the meeting on the new charter had supported Mr. Foss as president, now rose and stated, that after having heard Mr. Austin's opinion, which entirely coincided with his own, and the 31st by-law under the charter also being that no member of the society shall be capable of being a member of the committee of management, unless he shall be a practitioner of at least ten years' standing, he (Mr. Preston), considering the question to be purely a legal one, upon which, under the by-law especially, no lawyer could for a moment have any doubt, considered Mr. Foss ineligible, and must vote against his re-election, more especially as it would necessarily involve the society in further litigation.

Mr. Foss then read to the meeting a private opinion of Mr. Serjeant Merewether, given to a friend, upon the charter, but having no reference to the by-law, and the meeting having decided, Mr. Foss, as chairman, declared himself duly re-elected.

Mr. Ripley then, pursuant to notice, called the attention of the meeting to the compensation granted to those in the late office of the Six Clerks, and to the imputation cast on the society of having suggested and sanctioned those enormous compensations. According to the report of the debate on his friend Mr. Watson's motion for a committee of inquiry into how these compensations were obtained, as reported in Hansard, the Solicitor-General is stated to have said, "That the task of drawing the Act was intrusted to Mr. Wainwright (one of the compensated), but that it was not a true representation to say that Mr. Wainwright was the legislator, and that he sent his Bill through Parliament, because the Bill, though prepared by him (Mr. Wainwright), was submitted to a committee of the Law Institution, which was an incorporation of solicitors." In order to relieve the society from these imputations, he (Mr. Ripley) had given notice of his intention to move for the production of the communication received from the Master of the Rolls, inviting the suggestions of the committee of management as to the offices of the Court of Chancery, and the various papers submitted thereupon by the committee to the Master of the Rolls, with the previous reports of any sub-committee. It had been stated that the sub-committee from whom these papers emanated consisted of Mr. Foss (at that time not a solicitor), of Mr. Martineau, and Mr. Follett, who had both been appointed taxing masters under the Act, and of Mr. Field, who had written in defence of these compensations; neither Mr. Follett nor Mr. Field being upon the committee of management, and being therefore utterly incapable of forming part of a sub-committee of the committee of management, Mr. Ripley stated, that not expecting any answer from Mr. Foss, who had so long left the Profession, he appealed to Mr. Holme, and called on him as a gentleman, to state whether the committee of management had appointed such a sub-committee. Mr. Holme stated that it was undoubtedly true such sub-committee had been appointed; the committee of management had at that time been in the habit of associating upon sub-committees persons not upon the committee of management.

Mr. Webb, under these circumstances, seconded Mr. Ripley's motion for the production of these papers; he thought these compensations should be inquired into here, preparatory to an inquiry in a committee of the House of Commons.

Mr. Foss stated, that though it was true papers had been submitted by the committee, as stated, to the Master of the Rolls, it was not true that the committee of management had in any manner sanctioned those compensations. They had followed the example of Lord Cottenham in not giving any opinion upon the subject, trusting that they would have received due consideration in the House of Commons.

Mr. Ripley stated the imputation of having approved these compensations had already been indignantly denied, on behalf of Lord Cottenham, by Lord John Russell in the House of Commons. The compensations were in every material respect directly at variance with what had been done on the abolition of the equity side of the Court of Exchequer during the time Lord Cottenham was Chancellor.

Mr. Foss said the committee could not produce the communication received from the Master of the Rolls; and Mr. Ripley's motion, on a division, having been negatived, the meeting broke up.

LEGAL PROTECTIVE ASSOCIATION AND THE NEW BANKRUPTCY ACTS.

The following petition, and a similar one to the House of Commons, has been forwarded to us. It has emanated, we believe, from the Legal Protective Association. A meeting has been announced by the Provisional Committee of that association for Monday next.

To the Right Honourable the Lords Spiritual and Temporal of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, in Parliament assembled.

The humble petition of the undersigned tradesmen and shopkeepers—sheweth,

That your Lordships' petitioners have seen with great alarm and anxiety the recent passing of an Act of Parliament, intituled "An Act to amend the Law of Bankruptcy, Insolvency, and Execution," and containing a clause for abolishing imprisonment for debt in all cases where the debt shall not exceed 20*l.*

That your Lordships' petitioners are heavy and serious sufferers by the sudden and immediate operation and effect given to that particular clause, having given credit for a long time previous to the passing of the said Act for debts under 20*l.* and which are now, in nine cases out of ten, wholly worthless and lost to your petitioners.

That your Lordships' petitioners, as men of business and long experience in trade, are quite certain that it will be impossible for them to continue their various trades and businesses advantageously, either to themselves or families, landlords or other creditors, unless they are enabled to give credit, as heretofore, for debts under 20*l.*; and at the same time hold a security in terrorem, such as that of personal arrest upon judgment and execution, as it stood before the passing of the said Act.

That your Lordships' petitioners are aware that many hard and cruel cases of imprisonment for small debts by Courts of Request have taken place in different parts of the country, and which imprisonment your petitioners are most desirous should be abolished.

That your Lordships' petitioners are of opinion that the abolition of imprisonment for debt, for all debts under 5*l.* would effect the last-mentioned object.

That your Lordships' petitioners by the recent enactment have no security whatever for debts under 20*l.* as the claims of landlords, or of the pretended owners of goods and chattels, in some other way, will entirely place your petitioners at the mercy of the debtor.

That where credit is given for one debt above 20*l.* it is given in fifty cases under that sum; and that the effect of the 57th clause of the recent Act will be the closing of books of retail traders, the destruction of their trade, and the most disastrous and ruinous consequences to shopkeepers throughout the country, the effects of which wholesale dealers and merchants will ultimately feel.

That your Lordships' petitioners respectfully submit that no debtor for any sum whatever need remain compulsorily a prisoner for debt, but is now enabled to extricate himself therefrom by petition; and also, that he is now able, by a like petition in proper time, to prevent the necessity of his being imprisoned at all.

That your Lordships' petitioners, from long practical experience, believe that where one man has been imprisoned for debt under 20*l.* one hundred have paid their tradesmen through the fear of imprisonment, which is now removed.

That your Lordships' petitioners therefore humbly pray that the 57th clause of the recent Act, intituled "An Act to amend the Law of Bankruptcy, Insolvency, and Execution," may be at once repealed, except as to debts not exceeding 5*l.*

And your Lordships' petitioners shall ever pray, &c.

The provisional committee of the Legal Protective Association have also announced their objects to be—

1. To promote and support the general interests and privileges of the Profession.
2. To watch over all legislative interference tending to curtail or abrogate the just rights of the Profession.
3. To suppress, oppose, and prosecute (if necessary) all cases where unqualified persons usurp either the duties, profits, or privileges of the Profession.
4. To assist in obtaining all useful and practical reforms and amendments of the law.
5. To maintain the respectability of the Profession by an honourable and liberal mode of practice.
6. To adopt measures for obtaining a friendly cooperation with all law societies (provincial or local) having similar objects in view.

THE IRISH STATE TRIALS.

CONSULTATION OF THE JUDGES.

The private meeting of the judges at Lord Chief Justice Tindal's, in Bedford-square, on Thursday, did not terminate until a quarter to six o'clock in the afternoon; the learned personages thus having been nearly six hours conferring together on the objections taken by Sir Thomas Wilde, Mr. F. Kelly, Q. C. and the other eminent and able counsel who were heard on behalf of the traversers. Some misunderstanding arose as to the number of judges who attended the Bedford-square meeting, which may be easily accounted for by the difficulty experienced in obtaining any official information. The reporter was informed, upon authority, on Friday, that there were only six judges in attendance, in addition to Sir N. Conyngham Tindal; namely, Mr. Justice Parke, Mr. Justice Williams, Mr. Justice Coltman, Mr. Baron Alderson, Mr. Baron Gurney, and Mr. Justice Patteson. The other learned judges, including the Lord Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench (Lord Denman) and the Lord Chief Baron (Sir F. Pollock), sent in their opinions upon the writ of error in writing. It is not a little remarkable, that Sir F. Pollock, who so ably defended the legal objections taken at the memorable trial of Frost, Williams, and Jones, the Chartists, should have been called upon to decide in the present instance upon the weighty technicalities urged in favour of Mr. O'Connell and the other traversers so soon after his (Sir Frederick's) promotion to the Bench. It is stated that official notice has been given by the Crown solicitors to the legal gentlemen retained for the traversers that the day for delivering the judgment will stand as originally fixed, Monday, the 2nd of September. The applications for tickets of admission to the House of Lords have already been most numerous.

THE RIGHT OF TROUT-FISHING.

COURT OF SESSION, SCOTLAND.

A case which has excited much interest, and which is of importance to the proprietors of lands through which private rivers or streams run, was decided in the second division of the Court of Session on Wednesday last.

In November, 1841, Sir Charles Dalrymple Fergusson, bart. as proprietor of the lands and barony of Hailes, in East Lothian, which includes both banks of the river Tyne during a considerable portion of its course, raised an action of declarator against Mr. Charles H. Sheriff, then residing at Linton House, setting forth that Mr. Sheriff had lately been interfering with his right by trespassing upon his lands, and by angling or fishing for trout and other fishes in the stream which ran through them. The summons concluded to have Mr. Sheriff prevented from trespassing upon the lands of Hailes in future, and to have it declared that Sir Charles had the exclusive right to the fishing in the portion of the river which ran through the lands of Hailes, in the titles to which there is a clause of general right of fishing.

In defence it was pleaded, first, with regard to the alleged trespass, that there being a public road along the banks of the Tyne, the defender (1) as a member of the public, and (2) as an inhabitant of Linton House, had a legal right to use the same; and secondly, with regard to the right of fishing, "the defender having, as one of the public, or at least an inhabitant of Linton House, acquired the right to angle or fish for trout or other fishes in that part of the river Tyne which passes through the the pursuer's property, and to use the said footpath for the purposes of exercising the said right—the acts of angling or fishing libelled were not acts of trespass;" and further, that "the defender, as one of the public, was and is entitled to angle for trout in the Tyne, wherever the defender, by means of the public road in question, or otherwise, had or can have lawful access to the stream."

The first of these points having been submitted to a jury last summer, their verdict was returned in favour of the defender, establishing a right of public way along the north bank of the river. The remaining defences came on for discussion during the present session.

The arguments urged for the defender were substantially twofold. It was contended, in the first place, that access to the river having been obtained by means of the public road, the public were thereby enabled and entitled to exercise their inherent right of angling therein; and in the second place, supposing the Court not to acknowledge this right in the public, that the defender was at least entitled to an issue, under which he could prove that, for a period beyond the years of prescription, the public had been in use to exercise it.

After a lengthened hearing, the Court pronounced this judgment:—

"Edinburgh, July 17, 1844.—The lords having advised the remaining conclusions of the summons in this case, relative to the rights of fishings, allow the defender to make additional pleas in law; and having heard counsel in their own presence, repel the defences and pleas in law for the defender, and find that the pursuer has the sole and exclusive right of angling and fishing in the river Tyne, in any part of its course through the pursuer's lands of Hailes; and that the defender has no right or title to fish therein. Decern and declare accordingly, and prohibit and discharge the said defender from angling or fishing in that part of the said river, or from troubling or intercepting the pursuer in the peaceable possession and exercise of the right of fishing in that part of the said river Tyne above specified. Find the pursuer entitled to expenses of process of this discussion. Allow the account to be given in, and, when lodged, remit to the auditor of court to tax the same and to report.

DECREASE OF CRIME IN LIVERPOOL.—From official documents it appears that a considerable decrease has lately taken place in the number of prisoners confined in the borough prison of Liverpool. The average number is now only 540, whilst 12 or 18 months ago the number was 680. This decrease is mainly to be attributed to the great revival of trade which has taken place at Liverpool.

SIR WILLIAM FOLLETT.—We are happy to learn, from the very best authority, that Sir W. Follett has, since his departure for the continent, considerably improved in health.—Exeter paper.

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT FOR SUMS UNDER TWENTY POUNDS.—Although the Act for abolishing imprisonment for debt for sums not exceeding 20*l.* has been in operation for some time, yet some of the debtors in our gaols have been unable to avail themselves of it. In the county gaol there are eighteen debtors, ten of whom can claim their freedom under the Act. There are forms to go through which will necessarily take time, and besides this, there are expenses to be paid amounting to about 2*l.* for each debtor; this sum it will be very difficult for some of the prisoners to raise, and in some cases it will be impossible for them to do so. In the borough gaol there are only ten debtors; as they are all in for amounts less than 20*l.* they can claim their release upon the same terms, but it is supposed that a majority of them, including four sent by the Court of Requests, will be unable to raise the necessary funds; when they have done so, they will be liable to the claims of their creditors, as imprisonment will not discharge their obligations. As the fund called Pemberton's Charity will not have many demands upon it after the Act has come into full operation, it will be a matter for serious consideration for the trustees what is to be done with the proceeds.—Ipswich Express.

THE NEW JURY LISTS.—The churchwardens and overseers of the different parishes in the city and throughout the metropolis are actively engaged in making out the new jury lists of the names of persons residing in these parishes and places who are qualified to serve on juries pursuant to the Act of Parliament of Geo. 4, c. 50, s. 9, for the ensuing year. The lists when completed will be printed and fixed at the doors of the churches and chapels in the said parishes for three successive Sundays, beginning on Sunday the 1st of September till Sunday the 15th. The following important notice was issued on Saturday, at the Central Criminal Court, at the Old Bailey, Guildhall, and the Session Houses of Clerkenwell, Westminster, Kensington, Surrey, &c.:—"Considerable trouble having been heretofore occasioned to the courts in hearing applications by persons to be excused from serving on juries on account of their age, the churchwardens and overseers are desired to give notice that all persons whose names appear on the list allowed by the petty sessions, will be liable to serve on juries notwithstanding they are sixty years old and upwards. All exemptions from serving on juries on account of age or otherwise, must be claimed at the petty sessions to be held for the revision of such lists. The grounds of exemption are as follows:—peers, judges, clergymen, Roman Catholic priests who shall have duly taken and subscribed the oaths and declaration required by law; ministers of any congregation of Protestant Dissenters whose place of meeting is duly registered, provided they follow no secular occupation except that of a schoolmaster, and produce a certificate of some justice of the peace of their having taken the oaths and subscribed the declaration required by law; serjeants, barristers-at-law, members of the Society of Doctors at Law, advocates of the civil law if actually practising, and attorneys, solicitors, and proctors if actually practising, and having taken out their annual certificate; officers of the courts of law and equity, and of the Admiralty and Ecclesiastical Courts, if actually exercising the duties of their respective offices; coroners, gaolers, and keepers of houses of correction; members and licentiates of the Royal College of Physicians in London; members of the Royal College of Surgeons of London, Edinburgh, and Dublin; and apothecaries certified by the Court of Examiners of the Apothecaries' Company, if actually practising as physicians, surgeons, or apothecaries, respectively; officers of the navy and army on full pay; pilots licensed by the Trinity-house of Deptford, Strond, Kingston-upon-Hull, or Newcastle-upon-Tyne; masters of vessels in the buoy and light service, employed by either of those corporations; pilots licensed by the Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports, or under any Act of Parliament or charter for the regulation of pilots in any other port; household servants of her Majesty, officers of Customs and Excise, sheriffs' officers, high constables, parish clerks, registrars of births, deaths, and marriages, commissioners having a certificate under 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, and also all persons exempt by virtue of any prescription, charter, grant, or writ, and all persons upwards of sixty years of age."

A paper has been printed and circulated in the city, shewing the progress of private enterprise in Ocean steam navigation, the facts in which, being presented to the eye at one glance, are interesting, though in an isolated form they have always been accessible. The line of steam communication between England and America was established in 1838 by the "Great Western steam-ship," and maintained by that vessel, the "British Queen," and the unfortunate "President," till 1842, without the support of Government, or any contract for conveying the mails. The line to Halifax and Boston was established by Mr. Cunard, on obtaining a Government contract of 57,000*l.* per annum to convey the mails 186,300 miles. The line to the West Indies was established in 1842 by parties who, in 1840, took a contract for 240,000*l.* per annum to convey the mails 684,816 miles. The line to Malta and Alexandria was established in 1840-1 by the Peninsula Company, who took a contract for 31,000*l.* per annum to convey the mails 72,000 miles. The line between Calcutta and Suez was established in 1842 by the India Steam Company of Calcutta, but no assistance has been granted by Government for the mails. The line between Calcutta and Suez in 1843 and 1844 was (and is now) occupied by the Peninsula Company's vessels, with a grant of 20,000*l.* per annum for five years from the Indian Government, on condition of their performing 33,080 miles in the first year, 57,120 miles in the second, and 114,200 in the third.—Times.

Prophet Wroe's Robbery.—Innocent Parties Transported.—Our readers will remember that about two years ago, the house of Prophet Wroe was broken into and a silver watch stolen; also, that three men, called Benjamin and John Pickersgill and James Ramsden, were tried for the robbery at York Assizes, in August, 1842, and transported for ten years. It now appears, however, that the men were in no manner connected with the robbery, and are perfectly innocent of it. This information has been obtained from James Hudson, now a convict at York Castle, who has made a voluntary confession to the governor of the castle, by which it appears that the robbery was committed by himself and five other men, whose names he gives; he details the proceedings on the night of the robbery, and what was done with the property. We trust our magistrates will take measures by which these innocent men will be restored to their homes, and their families again made happy. —Wakefield Journal.

Pensions on the Civil List.—The following are the pensions which have been granted during the year ending June 20th last:—Dame Maria Bell, 100*l.* a year, in consideration of the services rendered to science by her late husband, Sir Charles Bell; Miss Ann Drummond, in consideration of the public services of her brother, the lamented E. Drummond, esq. assassinated by Macnaghten, 200*l.* a year; Robert Brown, esq. the botanist, 200*l.* a year; Dame Florentia Sale, wife of the hero of Jellalabad, 500*l.* a year; and Sir William Rowan Hamilton, the Astronomer Royal for Ireland, 200*l.* a year. Making, altogether, 1,200*l.* per annum thus conferred.

Ecclesiastical Courts.—Some returns on the subject of ecclesiastical courts have just been printed, on the motion of Mr. Elphinstone. It appears from an annexed summary of the particulars therein contained, that the gross total receipts of the judges and officers of the ecclesiastical courts amount, in the dioceses of England, to 101,171*l.*; in those of Wales to 4,882*l.*; and in those of Ireland to 15,459*l.*; making a grand sum total amounting to 120,512*l.*

The following building has been duly registered for the solemnization of marriages, pursuant to the Act 6 & 7 Wm. 4, c. 85:—Battersea Chapel, situated in Lower Wandsworth-road, in the parish of Battersea, in the county of Surrey, in the district of Wandsworth and Clapham union.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.

"Public feeling, reversing the natural order of affairs, sympathizes with the criminal and rejoices in his escape, not from punishment, but from a punishment which a voice within tells them to be one from which humanity shrinks, FORBIDDEN BY REASON, certainly inconsistent with Christianity."—Leading Article of Law Times, April 20th, 1844, Vol. 3, No. 55.

"Laws made for the preservation of the Commonwealth without great penalties are more often obeyed than laws made with extreme punishments."—Preamble to Act passed in the first year of Queen Mary.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

Sir,—In my first letter I considered this subject with reference to the Mosaic Code, in my second, the bearings of the Christian Dispensation upon it, and, in this third and last, I purpose, in pursuance of my formerly expressed intention, to consider how far you are borne out by fact in declaring the further continuance of the extreme penalty, "forbidden by reason," in which, on the contrary, we are assured by one of your correspondents, it finds its "sure ground and sanction alone."

It has been suggested to me, that some remarks in my letter of the 18th of June (Law Times, No. 60) savour of disrespect to judicial authorities. I beg to say, therefore, that no one feels greater respect than myself for the judgment-seat and the illustrious men who, in our days, fill it with so much honour to themselves and their country, and security to the liberties of the subject; but because they are clement and learned, there is no reason to extend that just respect to all the men and all the doings of those whom they have succeeded. And I look with pardonable disgust upon such a judge as Jefferies, Recorder Sylvester, and his coadjutor Alderman Curtis, with which two worthies it was a "standing joke" that when the latter was sheriff the numbers suspended after every sessions fell together at the New Drop "like pounds of candles. (a) I look too with melancholy regret on such a retrospect of the Criminal Jurisprudence of England as is presented in the following passages from the same writer. "During the second ten years of the reign of George III. the capital punishments in London savoured of butchery. Every six weeks there used to be a public procession from Newgate to Tyburn of from eight to fifteen and twenty criminals, chiefly youths." (b) "When Mansfield was Lord Chief Justice, Thurlow Lord Chancellor, and Rose Recorder, executions were so numerous, that the editor (Sir Richard) on one hanging holiday saw nineteen on the gallows, the oldest of whom was not twenty-two." (c)

Mr. Giles has alluded to the French Revolution, and seems to glean something favourable to his views from the unsuccessful attempt then made to abolish capital punishment. Would to Heaven the attempt had succeeded, and poor humanity been spared the horrors of the guillotine! It is disagreeable to be reminded by this allusion, that the frequency and extent of our systematized executions at Newgate drew from a celebrated actor in the opening scenes of the Revolution, the exclamation with great warmth and surprise, "The English are the most merciless people I ever heard or read of in my life." (d) The revolutionary guillotine made its 6,000 victims, but it was in a time of madness; a time of wrack and crash of all social elements. Harrison asserts, that in England, in the reign of Henry VIII. 72,000 criminals were executed for theft and robbery, which would amount to nearly 2,000 a year. (e) The fact is, that until within a very few years, our penal code rivalled that of Draco, and is, at the present moment, about the most sanguinary in Europe.

Since my last, your correspondent has published a letter, which he thinks confirmatory of his views, and he replies to my observations on the Mosaic Code that its nature "seems greatly misunderstood, as if it were adapted to a certain people, under certain circumstances, instead of human nature, which (he tells us) is the same under all circumstances." I shall content myself, in answer to this assertion, with a quotation from a Sermon by the Bishop of London (f), and am very happy to have a little ecclesiastical assistance in my argument. "Retaliation or revenge (says the Bishop), although they may appear at first sight justified by some features of the Mosaic Code, were yet only so far sanctioned as they were necessary to deter a gross and hard-hearted people from the commission of crime; and they are utterly to be reprobated as essential principles of penal jurisprudence, inasmuch as they are contrary to the general tenour even of the law, and directly opposed to the spirit of the Gospel: 'Vengeance is mine; I will repay, saith the Lord.'" The renowned divine Chillingworth left among his MSS. a tract entitled, "A Problematical Testament against punishing Crimes with Death in Christian Societies." (g)

"We distinguish (continues Mr. G.) in point of enormity between the crime of murder and other crimes to which the Mosaic law attaches an equal punishment, not because there is any real difference, but because our tone of morality is too relaxed to enable us to judge. It was the object of the Jewish law to maintain in that people a high moral tone, and as they receded from their high standing, their law became as much a dead letter to them as it is to us." The distinction, he informs us, between the crime of the murderer and that of the "determinedly rebellious son" is in "our gross perceptions, which cannot appreciate its blackness." According to this theory, the obligation of the Mosaic institutions ceased (upon what authority express or implied, in or out of Scripture, he does not inform us, its severities having, according to the same hypothesis, altogether failed of their object) in a direct ratio as an assumed increase of the grossness of man's perceptions, and in nowise as the ratio of the increase of civilization!! By the operation of this cause, only the binding character of the capital penal enactments of the Jewish lawgiver against theft, neglect of the Sabbath, contempt of ecclesiastical courts, &c. &c. is gone, and the law against stoning for adultery had become a dead letter in the time of our Saviour, who would not sanction its revival! "In the case, however, of murder (he says), it is different, every one having sufficient perception of its enormity." And has not then every one sufficient perception of the enormity of dishonouring his neighbour's wife? Surely the guilt was sufficiently obvious. But Mr. Giles's theory is not only contradictory in itself, he has not even the merit of making it consistent with his own prior declarations. What does his own version of the case amount to, but an accommodation—approved by the divine founder of Christianity—of the old law to changed circumstances?—diametrically opposed to what he stated a few lines before, that the Mosaic law "was not adapted to a certain people in certain circumstances, but to human nature, which is the same under all circumstances!"

But where would the argument lead? If the rigour of the divine command was only relaxed because men's perceptions had become gross, and if the maxim cessante ratione cessat quoque effectus be any thing more than a cant phrase, how much more obligatory in its whole extent must this divine law be, now that men's minds are refined by the opening of every avenue of knowledge, and the preachings of the Christian ministry? So that the conclusion goes to a revival of ALL the severities of the Jewish Code. For, certainly, our "tone of morality" is at least as high as was ever, at any period of their history, that of the rebellious, stiff-necked, carnal Jews, a nation notoriously prone to idolatry and the grossest lusts. (h) To such absurd extremes will men run in support of a favourite prejudice!

But it is asked, "If it is allowed that the murderer merits death, why not avow it?" The answer is obvious:—The legitimate object of human law is not vengeance, but, first, prevention of others from committing crime; and, secondly, reformation of the offending. "Vengeance is mine, saith the Lord." The question comes back to the plain inquiry: "Is it necessary to destroy life?"—if unnecessary, unjustifiable. Is it in the actual state of society and public feeling attended with bad consequences? If so,—repugnant to Christianity and reason. Roman Catholic divines place the question, in common with the Protestant authorities quoted, on no other footing, and assert no warrant on account of guilt per se to destroy human life. They answer the question, "An respublica potest pro libitu malefactores occidere?" "Negativè: sed tantùm reipublicæ multùm noxios: unde non est hìc attendenda gravitas seu malitia peccati secundùm se, sed nocumentum quod infert reipublicæ." (f) If the nocumentum reipublicæ, therefore, is greater from shedding blood by law than would ensue from the discontinuance of judicial homicide, the reason fails. So much then for this often reiterated pretence of absolute justification from express injunction.

It is on the principle of their inefficacy and inutility that we advocate this cause. It is the cause of society, and not in the first instance of the criminal. Though even the criminal we would not unnecessarily torture—above all, would not send him unprepared and in the awful circumstances of heinous guilt, to abide eternal judgment. And permit me to say it is the sentiment of a savage only, and most thoroughly unchristian, that a great criminal is as such to receive no consideration at the hands of society. The attempt to establish a parallel between an execution in the ordinary course of judicial procedure and the case of slaying an invading enemy is puerile. It is the casum reservatum—and the only one, according to Beccaria, in which deliberate killing is no murder. But the killing even an invader, if he could conveniently be made prisoner and kept in safe custody, would be an atrocity unrecognized, I imagine, by the rules of war.

With these views, M. C. Lucas, Inspector of the Prisons of France, expresses the conclusions of his experience and reflection thus: "Quand donc la société dresse aujourd'hui l'échafaud, le meurtre qu'elle prépare est doublement illégitime. 1. Illégitime, parce qu'il n'est pas réclamé par le besoin de sa conservation, par le droit de sa défense; 2. Illégitime parce qu'elle ne tue pas pour se defendre d'un ennemi, mais pour punir un couapable, que c'est comme châtiment qu'elle donne la mort, qu'elle fait acte de pénalité et non de conservation." (k)

But if the extreme penalty is forbidden by reason, how (it is asked) did none of the philosophers who studied the καλον and the πρεπον, hear reason's voice?—THEY DID. And did not hear it without acting on it. Sabacus, the So of the Scriptures, during his reign of fifty years over Egypt, abrogated the punishment of death altogether, substituting hard labour. (l) "It is pleasing to remark," says M. Woolrych, "that Herodotus not only relates the absence of capital punishments for the most part in ancient Persia, but declares his commendation of the custom which forbade the sovereign from putting to death for a single offence." was abolished by the united voice of the Roman Senate, on the motion of P. Porcius Læca. A law referred to with approving eloquence by the philosophic Cicero, "O, nomen dulce libertatis. O, jus eximium nostræ civitatis. O, lex Portia, legesque Semproniæ!" It was the tyrant Scylla who returned to the old system. The Germans punished murder not with death, but by fine.(n) A similar usage prevailed among our Anglo-Saxon ancestors, and among the Franks.(o)

Enough has now been said, without adding more, to shew that when your correspondent declared "not one" of the great men of antiquity had heard the voice of reason condemning judicial bloodshedding, he made no inconsiderable mistake.

Even your correspondent's quotation from the poet Ovid takes a contrary meaning when ungarbled, and is certainly much improved by what he found it more convenient to omit.

"Cuncta prius tentata: sed immedicabile vulnus Ense recedendum, ne pars sincera trahatur."

The following (permit me to suggest) from the same author, seems a much better suited to a gentleman who affects to think that Mary Sealey's case "may be a very fair argument for reviving the old proceeding against a jury by attaint."

"Ibimus in pœnas, et qua vocat ira sequemur!"

It may be assumed generally that capital punishment is forbidden by reason, because all punishment being in itself an evil, justified only by necessity, à fortiori must that punishment which takes the life of a criminal, when experience tells us it is inefficacious, and that the happiest results have followed its discontinuance."(p)

"L'expérience de tous les siècles (says Brissot)(q) prouve que la crainte du dernier supplice n'a jamais arrêté les scélérats déterminés à porter le trouble dans la société. L'exemple des Romains atteste cette vérité, elle est mise dans son plus beau jour par vingt années du règne de l'empératrice de Russie Elisabeth." That empress, it will be recollected, pledged herself, on mounting the throne, never to inflict the punishment of death, and kept her word. Peter III. was not less frugal of the blood of his subjects, and the celebrated Catherine II. from a full persuasion of its being useless—nay, even pernicious, gave orders for abolishing it entirely. The following is from her Grand Instructions for framing a new Code of Laws for the Russian Empire, art. 210. "Experience demonstrates that the frequent repetition of capital punishment hath never yet made men better. If, therefore, I can shew that, in the ordinary state of society, the death of a citizen is neither useful nor necessary, I shall have pleaded the cause of humanity with success;" and she concluded in the same article, "In such a state there can be no necessity for taking away the life of a citizen;" summing up with the following magnificent and truly Christian comment upon the experiment of her illustrious predecessor, "The twenty years' reign of the Empress Elizabeth gave the fathers of the people a more excellent pattern than that of all the pomps of war, victory, and devastation held forth by the most glorious conquerors."

The Grand Duke Leopold, on his accession to the throne of Tuscany, in 1763, suspended the punishment of death. What consequences ensued? Was it followed by a "fearful outbreak of violence?" an apprehension which Mr. Giles says "alone forbids our hazarding it."(r) No such thing. In 1786, the Duke promulgated a new code, formally abolishing it, and in the edict states that the experiment had been attended with the most complete success. Again, twenty-two years after Leopold's accession, we find a writer thus expressing himself:—"Cette adoucissement des loix a ad[illegible] 'ci les mœurs publiques," &c.(s) But this is not all; four years after the promulgation of his new code, Leopold was called to the empire of Austria, and the punishment of death was re-enacted in Tuscany, owing to the general alarm caused by the French revolution. M. C. Lucas (see page 359 of his work, before quoted), wishing to be informed of the results which followed the revival, after a discontinuance of thirty years, applied to M. Berlinghiéri, the Tuscan minister in Paris, and received the following reply:—"Il n'y a pas de doubte que l'humanité de la législation pénale de Leopold, et en particulier L'ABOLITION de la peine de mort, n'ait été suivie pour la Toscane des résultats les plus satisfaisans. Je ne sais pas si sous son règne il ne s'est pas commis plus de cinq assassinats; mais ce que je sais bien, c'est que ces délits de tout genre ont été beaucoup plus rares alors qu'avant et qu'apres."

To bring our inquiries nearer home—what says the experience of our own countrymen? Here is the testimony of an Ordinary of Newgate—the great human slaughter-house:—"From every thing I have witnessed (says the rev. gentleman) I am decidedly clear that executions, managed as they are at present, answer no end whatsoever, either for punishment or example."(t) The three years' experience of Edward Gibbon Wakefield, esq. in Newgate, led him to the same conclusion at a later period.(u) But to pass again from opinions on the working of the hanging system to the practical results of a contrary policy:—During seven years that Sir James Mackintosh presided in the Supreme Court of Bombay there was no capital execution for any crime whatever, and the convictions for murder were only six. In the preceding seven years there were twelve executions, and the convictions for murder amounted to sixteen. "Whether any evil consequence has yet arisen from so unusual (and in the British dominions, so unexampled) a circumstance as the disuse of capital punishment for so long a period as seven years, among a population so considerable, is a question," says Sir James, in his farewell charge to the grand jury, "which you are entitled to ask, and to which I have the means of affording you a satisfactory answer." He then enters at length into the facts establishing his declaration.

It is well known that death-punishment was not tolerated by the enlightened founders of the republic of Pennsylvania. The same principle has prevailed ever since, and we find a late traveller applauding the penitentiary system established in that province as the means of reforming a considerable number of convicted criminals. "Here," says he, speaking of Pennsylvanian prisons, "is the best of all evidence, demonstrative proof, that brutal treatment, hangings and gibbetings, are neither the most economical nor the most efficacious, as they certainly are neither the most humane nor the most enlightened, modes of punishing crime or reforming society.(x) In Louisiana, the General Assembly assented to a proposition made by the compiler of their code, M. Edward Livingstone, that the punishment of death should be abolished.(y) The great Dr. Franklin entertained the same decided objection to severity.(z)

The official returns of the Belgian Chamber of Deputies (as Mr. Slack has remarked, Law T. vol. 3, No. 60) exhibit the most gratifying results from the abolition of the extreme penalty. Even Egypt has preceded enlightened and evangelized England in the amelioration of its criminal law, by abolishing death punishment for murder.—(Revue Encyclop. vol. xlv. p. 204.)

How long are we to have Holloway and Haggerty and Saville tragedies from time to time re-enacted? How long are barbarous exhibitions of homicide to remain the opprobrium of our land? How long is an unnatural conflict between the solemn oaths of jurymen and the desire to avoid further bloodshed, causing them, as it is asserted in Mary Sealey's case, and more recently, according to some, in Belaney's case,(aa) to prefer the impunity of guilt to participation in it? Was Dalmas guilty, innocent, or mad? Was M'Naughten? It cannot be denied, that in capital cases the chances of impunity for guilt are tripled. The question discussed in the jury-box is not—Is there reasonable evidence of the prisoner's guilt? but—Shall we hang him?

It is asked—What would you substitute for death? I answer—incarceration for life. "Let there be a prison (says Mr. Wrightson) set apart for this special purpose; and let the man who may be tempted to break the laws know this for a certainty, that if he once enters its walls there will be no pardon, no commutation; that he will never leave it until he is carried out a corpse." Mr. Alderman Harmer, who has more practical experience on this subject than perhaps any other person in the country, concludes his evidence before the Criminal Law Commissioners with these words: "A man is forgotten directly he is hanged, and his friends think no more about him,—indeed, they do not wish to recal him to memory; but if he is alive, in misery and suffering, all his associates and acquaintances are feeling sympathy for him; and the dread of meeting a similar fate deters others from going on in the same courses." "Multi sunt (says Sallust) qui mortem ut requiem malorum contemnunt et graviter repavescunt ad captivitatem."

It is pretended that the success of the cause I have so imperfectly advocated would be an outrage on the Crown, by "plucking from it one of its fairest jewels;"

that if judicial homicide were abolished, it might be truly said—"Terras Astræa reliquit."

I should rather say, looking to what has already taken place in America, Russia, Austria,(bb) Tuscany, Belgium, the Danish dominions,(cc) and Egypt, as well as to the pages of history, whence it undeniably appears that in times past much more innocent blood has been shed by public tribunals than by private malice; looking to these things, and at our own tardiness in attending to the signs of the times, I should rather say, on the abolishment of death-punishment—

"Astræa, Respexit tamen et longo post tempore venit!"

And so far from plucking a jewel from the Crown, in that abolition I believe would consist, in the eye of times to come, one of the greatest glories of the reign of Victoria: a result which, under the auspices of the profound legal acquirements, enlarged experience, and brilliant talents of Mr. Fitzroy Kelly, and with the co-operation of the press,—that powerful exponent of the spirit of the age,—let us hope is not unlikely to ensue should her Majesty's reign happily extend as long as her loyal subjects could wish it.

I thank you, Mr. Editor, for your indulgence, and doubt not that, as in this instance, the Law Times will ever be found among the friends of humanity, and the advocates of the practical development of all the advantages of increased social order.

I am, Sir, yours truly,
George John Durrant.

THREATENING LETTER NUISANCE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

Sir,—In reference to the query of yours, contained in the Law Times of the 10th inst. as to whether an indictment could be sustained against the author of a letter therein described, I am fearful it is not a criminal offence. I have read the observations of your correspondent A B in the Law Times of the 24th inst. who thinks an indictment may be effectually sustained on the statute of 4 Geo. 4, c. 54, s. 3; but I find that the part of the section which he quotes is repealed by the 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 27, and re-enacted by the 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 29, s. 8, which enacts, that if any person shall knowingly send or deliver any letter or writing demanding of any person, with menaces, and without any reasonable or probable cause, any chattel, money, or valuable security, every such offender shall be guilty of felony. But inasmuch as the writer of the letter had a reasonable cause for demanding the money, I think, with the greatest deference, that an indictment could not be sustained, and surely the intention of neither Acts was to meet the case alluded to.

It is indeed desirable that the threatening-letter-gentlemen should be put down, but I think the extermination of these bastard lawyers can only be accomplished by the united efforts of the Profession.

I am, &c.
Jno. Ewing Jeffery.

SELECTIONS FROM CORRESPONDENCE.

"W." makes the following suggestions upon the "Justices' Clerks Bill," which has been brought forward for the consideration of the public, preparatory to its discussion in Parliament:—

Allow me, through the medium of your valued and most useful journal, to offer a few remarks upon the "Justices' Clerks Bill," lately introduced before Parliament by Sir James Graham. It is a Bill calculated to remedy many of the existing evils, but I would extend its provisions still further. I think a clause empowering justices' clerks, out of session, to sign the necessary forms, would be a great advantage. At present, parties have often to go miles to obtain their warrants, &c. signed by a magistrate; and it often happens the magistrates are all from home, and justice is thereby delayed, as time is too short to obtain redress at their next session. I do not see any difficulty in this suggestion, as the clerk, before he issues the process, minutely inquires into the charge, whether or not it is fit for the cognizance of the Bench; and the mere signing by the magistrate is only a form preparatory to the hearing, and causes trouble and inconvenience to the aggrieved party. The merits of the case would afterwards come before the Bench at petty sessions; and I do not see any fraud or delay would arise, but on the contrary. Perhaps much time would be saved by each magistrate's clerk having a seal attached to his office, by which all processes, &c. issued should be stamped; and that when so stamped should be to all intents and purposes valid and effectual as if signed by one of the magistrates within his division; and that the (bb) Austria has reduced its capital crimes to two; we have still an extensive catalogue,—eight or ten, I think.

(cc) "The punishment of death was abolished in the Danish dominions about the end of the last century."—Laing's Residence in Norway, 2nd edit. p. 229, London, 1837.

clerk should have power also, out of session, to grant processes on oath of the party aggrieved, and generally to do all such things usually done before hearing, in such and the same manner as if a magistrate was present and did the same. I would also empower justices' clerks, out of petty sessions, to take bail until the ensuing petty sessions for parties taken into custody for a breach of the peace or any minor offence (not felony); as otherwise, if the petty sessions are held on stated days, suppose a person is taken into custody on such a charge the day after the petty session, he would have to remain until the next session deprived of liberty, which I am sure our legislature never once intended. I also beg to call your attention to prosecutions at sessions and assizes, and to ask whether or not the justices' clerks will monopolize all prosecutions against persons committed by the Bench for which they act, or the prosecutions will be open to the Profession on retainers from the prosecutor? If the former, it will be a great injustice to the Profession, and will call loudly for redress.

A "Constant Reader" thus expresses his dissent from the opinions which have appeared in our columns on the "Point of Practice" put by Mr. Leigh:—

Pray who is to give the mortgagee's solicitor instructions? Upon what pretence is the solicitor to manage the estate when the interest is punctually paid, and the principal forthcoming on demand or notice? He is indeed entitled to be satisfied that the arrangement in which his client may be called upon to concur is not disadvantageous to him, and this is the extent of his duty.

The case would be different when the mortgagee was in actual possession; but in general, until that event takes place, the mortgagor ought to be able "to do what he will with his own."

The injustice of a strange attorney, comparatively uninterested in the matter in question, taking the management of the whole business, is to me most apparent. He might, indeed, prepare a farming lease, and the injustice might not be glaring. But take the case in extremes. Suppose a gentleman to have raised a small sum on a large estate, either on mortgage or deposit of his deeds, and he wishes to let a lead or a coal mine, or a large manufacturing or brewing concern, would it not be monstrous that the lender's attorney should take the management of the business and the drawing of the lease, with all the important special provisions which such a case would require? If the rule were insisted on, all the real work would be done by the mortgagor's attorney, and the other would have only the trouble of charging for it. Of course the mortgagor would not trust his interest in the hands of a stranger who had no other motive to do his duty beyond the preservation of his client's principal money and interest. If it is not just in such a case as this, it is not in any case. It would be making the lender of money a tyrant over th borrower; and it might just as well be said that the mortgagee should prepare the reconveyance of the mortgaged estate on payment of his money. The fact of the legal estate being in the mortgagee makes no difference, in my opinion. The question is, who is the owner of the estate for the time being?

The following remark of a correspondent as to the confusion of the names James and Jacob in the registers at Doctors'-commons, if correct, requires immediate attention from the officials in that quarter:—

In searching for an old will in Doctors'-commons to-day, I lighted on several of the surname which I wanted, but having the Christian name of "James" prefixed. I was looking for "Jacob." It struck me that as several of the old books have been re-copied, and in the originals the two names were both written "Jacobus," the copyist might have made some mistake in translating the word. I have not tested their accuracy yet, but if it be a mistake, it is one of very serious import; and I can hardly fancy that, whenever the copyist came to a "Jacobus Smith," he took the trouble to refer to the original will to see whether the name was "James" or "Jacob."

"A Subscriber" raises the following point upon the "Transfer of Property Act:"—

By the new Transfer of Property Act, section 9, it is enacted, that "When any person has, or shall have, departed this life, and his executor or administrator is or shall be entitled to the money secured upon the mortgage," the executor or administrator may convey the legal estate. Section 13 enacts that, "This Act shall commence from the 31st day of December, 1844, and shall not extend to any deed, act, or thing executed or done, or (except as to existing contingent remainders) to any estate, right, or interest created before the 1st day of January, 1845."

Does this Act extend to any mortgage executed before 1st of January, 1844, and if so, does it enable the executor or administrator of any mortgagee, becoming such executor or administrator before 1st of January, 1845, to convey the legal estate vested in the heir or devisee of the mortgagee?

CHANCERY COMPENSATION JOB AND THE LAW INSTITUTION.

FORTUNE, it is said, favours the bold; but even the boldest may sometimes overshoot their mark. Rarely indeed has this axiom been relied on so confidently as it must have been by those who planned, and temporarily succeeded in carrying out, the Compensation job. Still, let them not suppose that they are out of danger. The various expedients that have been used to stifle or postpone inquiry are marked by all with indignation, and each day shews the necessity of a further inquiry, for there seems to be a studied shroud of mystery thrown over the origin and history of the job, which clearly betrays the weakness of the cause. The Government mainly owed their success in resisting Mr. Watson's motion by the assertion—subsequently proved to have been a slight mistake—that Lord Cottenham had approved of the compensation clauses. The Law Institution were then supposed to have been the main movers in the business. It now appears they decline the proffered honour of paternity to this strange bantling. After a silence, which we wish had been somewhat less protracted, it was stated by Mr. Foss, at the annual meeting, a report of which will be found in another part of our columns, "that though it was true papers had been submitted by the committee, as stated, to the Master of the Rolls, it was not true that the Committee of Management had in any manner sanctioned those compensations. They had followed the example of Lord Cottenham, in not giving any opinion upon the subject, trusting that they would receive due consideration in the House of Commons."

The production of the correspondence was, however, refused, and beyond this denial—a very important one—no new materials for the secret history of this very dark and unjustifiable transaction have been furnished. In spite of the petty reduction of the fees, which seems to have been made in the hope of lessening the indignation of all, and more especially of the solicitors and suitors, the subject must again be brought forward. Let not the Profession faint or falter in this just cause. Mr. Watson will doubtless again call the attention of Parliament to it. We have very recently seen, in the case of the Post-office, how the Government must yield to the strongly-expressed opinion of the public, and for the honour of all parties, we hope they will again be compelled to grant at last an inquiry which never ought to have been refused.

We cannot close these remarks without expressing our surprise at the somewhat irregular proceedings disclosed at the last meeting of the Law Institution.

It seems that the Committee of Management have not unfrequently appointed persons not upon the committee as members of the sub-committee of management. This is contrary to every established rule of carrying on public business, and we trust it will not be again repeated. The dispute about the legality of the last meeting is purely a question of law, into which we wish not to enter.

THE NEW BANKRUPTCY AND INSOLVENT ACTS.

A MEETING was to have been held yesterday between the Commissioners of the Court of Bankruptcy and certain of the Country Commissioners for the purpose of framing Rules and Orders under the recent Acts relating to insolvents; but nothing authentic has yet transpired on the subject, and probably nothing will for a few days, as the Regulations under 7 & 8 Vict. c. 94 require the sanction of the Lord Chancellor. It is understood that the Rules under the Debtors and Creditors Act, 7 & 8 Vict. c. 70, will be very simple, as it is the object of that statute, which we published in a late number, to carry out amicable arrangements with as little publicity or technical interference as can be made consistent with the due execution of the trusts. Parties are left very much to their own discretion; the forms, as far as we have heard, only apply to the mode of protection; and the certificate, that the trusts have been fully carried into effect; this latter is a very important document, as it acts as a certificate of conformity to the debtor, and as a quietus to the trustee.

There is to be no set form of petition; but we recommend petitioners to follow, as concisely as possible, the terms of the Act. If the proposed arrangement is short, it may be inserted in the body of the petition; but if there is a long deed, it may be sufficient to refer to it as annexed.

By what fell from one of the Commissioners in Court, we infer that a deposit, not for fees, as erroneously reported, but for necessary expenses, is to be paid under both Acts. The inconvenience of hurried legislation at the very end of a session is very manifest in each of these measures, since those who are to carry them into execution have so little time to consider the best mode of doing so; and the law is actually in force before the Profession can understand its bearings.

The question of attestation, for instance, which now seems to be set at rest by the concurrence of all the constituted authorities, caused no small agitation; the Times, and other papers, denouncing the ex-Chancellor, and the Herald, the Commissioners.

PROFESSIONAL MALPRACTICES.

AMONG other consequences the new Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, it has brought forward more prominently into view a full crop of advertising attorneys. Perhaps some of our readers can inform us something of the history of the gentleman who has circulated the following handbill:—

"ANTI-IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT AND MUTUAL PROTECTION SOCIETY.

"IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT.

"By the 5 & 6 Victoria, cap. 116, any person being a trader, but owing debts under 300*l.*—and non-traders to any amount—can be cleared of their difficulties without being exposed to the present cruel, illegal, and unconstitutional system of imprisonment for debt.

"THOMAS LORD,
"Solicitor to the late Mary-le-bone Roads Commissioners."

It would be well to know how the "Solicitor to the late Mary-le-bone Roads Commissioners" has become one of the disreputable section who, under cover of the name, bring disgrace upon the profession of an attorney. Who are the members of the "Mutual Protection Society?" A list would be invaluable.

A Mr. George Lewis has issued a somewhat similar circular, dated No. 4, Barnard's-inn, London, which he concludes in the true spirit of philanthropy, that "In cases of very poor prisoners I shall have no objection to procure the orders for them on receiving a post-office order for 30s. in each case."

In the country papers, as well as the London journals, advertisements of this kind inform all respectable men whom they must shun. We have, for instance, a Mr. W. Clark, of Oxford, upon whose proceedings an observant eye will be kept. We should be glad to know who L. L. D. 7, Clement's-inn, Strand, is. If not in the Profession, let him beware; and if he is an unworthy member of it, we will expose his malpractices, that his gain of a few shillings by them shall be more than counterbalanced by the scorn of the rest of the Profession.

We refer our readers to the interesting question raised by Mr. Horry, at the Clerkenwell Police Court. It is very desirable that a decision should be speedily come to upon it. We hope, ere long, to see the Profession uniting in determined efforts to exclude sham-attornies, accountants, and clerks from exercising functions to which they have no legal title.

PRACTICE—PLEADING—EVIDENCE.

LECTURE X.

In many forms of action the declaration discloses little more than the legal nature of the plaintiff's claims, but gives no specific information of the details. For instance, in an action of debt for goods sold and delivered, the declaration contains merely a statement that, whereas the defendant was indebted to the plaintiff in so much for goods sold and delivered by the plaintiff to the defendant, to be paid on request, yet he hath not paid the same, and still refuses to do so. Not a single fact is material except that certain goods have been sold, and a certain sum is owing; it says, indebted in some specified sum—for instance, 20*l.* for goods sold and delivered. But the sum stated in the declaration is not material: the plaintiff having stated one sum, may prove another. All the information given is that there is a claim made in respect of certain goods sold and delivered. Hence the practice arose for the judge, at the instance of the defendant, to order the plaintiff to furnish particulars of demand; and in all actions of debt by simple contract and indebitatus assumpsit, the plaintiff is now, by rule of court, required to furnish particulars, which are to be comprised within three folios. The bill of particulars forms no part of the record; it is never made up on the record; if there is a writ of error, the bill of particulars forms no part of it; it is a mere memorandum of the plaintiff's claim. When the plaintiff has stated his case in the declaration, it is for the defendant to consider what answer he shall make. If he considers the plaintiff's statement insufficient in law, he may demur; if he does not demur, he pleads; if he does neither the one nor the other within the time limited by the practice of the court, the plaintiff may sign judgment for want of a plea—judgment by default. If, in any subsequent stage, the defendant neglects to plead, he is considered to offer no opposition to the demand of the plaintiff, and to admit all the material allegations in the declaration. In an action of debt, which is supposed to claim a specific sum, judgment is final; in assumpsit and other actions which sound in damages, judgment is interlocutory only, and the damages must be ascertained by a writ of inquiry executed by the sheriff, before the plaintiff will be entitled to final judgment. In judgment by default, there is an admission on the part of the defendant that the plaintiff is entitled to certain damages. In an action of trespass, it is an admission that the plaintiff is entitled to damages for the trespass the defendant has committed. In order to know what the damages are, you must have them assessed by a jury, which is done under a writ of inquiry executed by the sheriff. So in an action of assumpsit, which is an action to recover damages, the jury are to ascertain what the damages are which have been sustained by the defendant's not doing that which he had promised to do. In debt, the form is otherwise, for there a specific sum is claimed to be due. It is quite true that if you claim one sum you are enabled to recover a smaller sum if you prove it; still the sum claimed is, in form, admitted to be due. In practice this takes place. Supposing judgment to go by default, the sum claimed is 100*l.*; the sum actually due is 20*l.* The plaintiff, though in point of form he is entitled to judgment and execution for 100*l.*, only has judgment and execution for 20*l.*; he is limited by his particulars of demand. In practice he only sues; for if a bill of particulars had been given, in which 20*l.* was claimed, the Court would set aside the execution if taken out for a larger sum.

Pleas are of two kinds,—dilatory and peremptory. A dilatory plea is merely an objection to the particular action. A peremptory plea is one that impugns the right of action altogether. Of dilatory pleas the most important are those—first, to the jurisdiction; and, secondly, pleas in abatement. A plea to the jurisdiction is an objection to the competency of the Court in which the action is commenced. This is not of frequent occurrence in the superior courts, their jurisdiction being very well known and very extensive. In the inferior courts this plea is pleaded frequently, and in borough courts that have jurisdiction over matters arising within the borough, it is not uncommon to plead that the cause of action did not arise within the borough, but somewhere without it. This plea puts an end to the action that is commenced in the borough court, and leaves the plaintiff to commence an action elsewhere. In a plea to the jurisdiction, it is not sufficient merely to object to the jurisdiction of the court in which the action is brought, but the defendant must shew that there is some other court in which the action may be proceeded with.

A plea in abatement, in its common acceptation, consists, as it is described in Blackstone, of two distinct classes; first, where an objection is raised to the disability of the plaintiff, by reason whereof he is incapable to commence or continue the suit; secondly, where the writ is sought to be quashed or abated on account of some insufficiency contained therein, or by reason of some matter out of the writ or declaration set forth by the defendant: the effect of both is the same. Dilatory pleas are, first, to the jurisdiction of the court; secondly, to the disability; and are addressed, first, to the person of the plaintiff, and secondly, to the person of the defendant, and thirdly, which is more correctly a plea in abatement, to the court or the declaration, or to the writ. That, I believe, does not occur except in real actions; it does not occur in personal actions.(a) A plea of abatement on account of disability of the plaintiff may be that he is an "alien enemy;" or in actions which cannot be brought by an alien, whether an alien enemy or not, that he is an alien. That plea was pleaded in Pisani v. Lawson (6 Bing. N.C. 90). Pisani brought an action against Lawson for a libel. Pisani was one of the dragomans or interpreters to the English ambassador at Constantinople. There had been a libel in the Times, imputing to him subserviency to Russia, breach of duty, and want of faithfulness; and, in answer to the action, Lawson pleaded that he was an alien, and had never been in England. It was held nevertheless that the action would lie; that here was a libel by which Pisani was injured; and that he had a right to bring the action. Now, supposing money to be owed by an Englishman to a foreigner; that foreigner, the two countries being at peace, might come to this country and bring an action in our courts against the Englishman for the debt; but supposing the debt to exist, and a war to break out between the two countries, the foreigner could not commence an action during the continuance of the war; if he did, the plaintiff might plead "alien enemy." We come next to the disability of the defendant. For instance, if a woman enters into a contract—if she has goods furnished to her, or incurs any liability, and afterwards marries and is impleaded, she may plead her coverture in abatement. The action is brought against her as a femme sole; she pleads that she has taken husband, and is not liable to the action. If she were married at the time, she could n , plead it in abatement. If she was married at the time, under ordinary circumstances, and made a contract, either it is no contract at all or it is the contract of the husband: she cannot make it on her own account. If it is a valid contract, it is made by her as the agent of the husband, and an action, if brought at all, must be brought against the husband; if the action is brought against her, she must plead in bar to the action that she made no contract, because she as at the time a married woman. That is an answer completely to the demand—there never was any contract of the kind alleged. But it is different where she first makes a contract and afterwards marries. Here there was a contract valid at the time; but it is a contract to which she is no longer liable, by reason of her coverture. There is, therefore, a disability in the defendant, but merely a disability, and she is therefore required to shew how that disability occurs, so as to enable the plaintiff to bring the action against the husband.

We now come to what in common law is called a misnomer. If the defendant was misnamed on the writ, or in the declaration, that would be termed a misnomer, and might be pleaded in abatement. This is now no longer allowed. The defendant so misnamed is at liberty to have the declaration amended at the expense of the plaintiff. John Jones is called Thomas Jones, and so declared against. Instead of pleading that his name is not Thomas, but John, he makes a special application to the Court, stating his name, and thereupon the declaration is amended, and the cause goes on regularly. So in the case of a misjoinder. If there are several persons jointly liable on a contract, the action must be against them all. If goods are sold to a mercantile firm, consisting of two partners, if one is sued alone, he may plead in abatement the non-joinder of the other; he must plead in abatement that he did not make the debt except together with A B. A plea in abatement must, in the language of the old law, give a better writ; it must shew to the plaintiff how he may commence another action so as to suit the case. If one person has an action brought against him, he cannot say he incurred the liability jointly with other persons, without naming them—this would not give the plaintiff a better writ; it would not shew him how to bring a fresh action,—but he must plead that he incurred it only together with A B and C D, in order that the plaintiff may commence his action against all three. The plea of non-joinder as a plea in abatement remains, with this modification, that if the person left out has been discharged by bankruptcy or a certificate under the Insolvent Act, the defendant need not join him, for by the Law of Amendment Act, if the defendant pleads non-joinder, the plaintiff may reply that such is the fact; that where the action is brought against two men who entered into a contract, one man says I did not enter into the contract except jointly with C D; the plaintiff may admit that and say yes, but C D is a bankrupt; and he may then go on against A B alone. Non-joinder cannot be pleaded in abatement, unless it be stated in the plea that the person who should have been joined resides within the jurisdiction of the court. The defendant may also plead in abatement that there is another action depending for the same cause. The effect of a plea in abatement, if it succeeds, is to defeat the action, but the right of action is not affected by it. It defeats all the proceedings taken, but the plaintiff can commence proceedings again. If the plea is to the jurisdiction of the court, and the plea is held good, the defendant may proceed in the right court; the particular action is defeated, but the right of action is left undiminished. If the plea in abatement fails, a demurrer judgment is given for the plaintiff; it is respondeat ouster,—let the defendant answer over to the action. (Biggs v. Cox, 4 B. & C. 920.) That was an action of debt, brought by the assignees of a bankrupt for goods sold by the bankrupt, alleging promises made before his bankruptcy; the plea was a plea in abatement, that there was another action for the same cause of action brought before the bankruptcy, and still pending. The assignees demurred to that plea, and it was held that the plea was a bad one. The former suit was in point of law at an end; the bankrupt could not go on with the proceedings after he had become a bankrupt, nor could the assignees go on with it; the right of action was gone, and they must commence a new action; so that the fact of the bankrupt having commenced an action is no answer to one afterwards commenced by the assignees. "It does not appear," says the judgment of the Court, "how far the action commenced by Collier has proceeded, but for any thing that appears, the defendant may now plead the bankruptcy of the plaintiff in bar of it. The judgment of the Court in Kinnear v. Lavant corrected the former decisions, in which it was held that assignees might continue suits commenced by the bankrupt, and decided that the defendants might insist upon stopping such suits, and force the assignees to become plaintiffs, so that it might appear upon the record to whom the payment compelled by the judgment was made. But if assignees cannot continue an old action, it is clear that they may commence a new one in their own names. The plea is, therefore, insufficient, and the defendant must answer over." There the plea was held insufficient, and the defendant had to "answer over" to the action: he then pleads non assumpsit, or the like. Suppose issue had been joined on this plea in abatement, and the replication had been, that there was no such action pending as alleged in the plea, the question would then have been, whether there was or was not an action pending at the suit of the bankrupt himself. If it was found by the jury that there was not, the plea pleaded was false, and the judgment would have been for the plaintiff, that he do recover the debt, and there would have been no further inquiry except to ascertain the amount of damages; and the plaintiff would have been entitled to judgment on the issue found. So if the defendant pleads in abatement that the promise on which he is sued was made jointly with another person, and the plaintiff replies that the promise was made by the defendant alone and not jointly, and issue is joined on that; then, if the issue is found for the plaintiff, the judgment is peremptory that the plaintiff do recover, and no inquiry is left but to ascertain the amount; for whenever a man pleads a fact he knows to be false, and the verdict is against him, judgment ought to be final. He has made a statement which is false, and he must be supposed to know it. (2 Williams's Saunders, 367.) That was a plea of misnomer, which could not now be allowed, and that is as strong a case as can possibly be put. An action is brought against a man of the name of John Jones, and he pleads in abatement, "My name is Thomas," and the question is raised whether the name is John or Thomas, and it is found that the name was John, as the plaintiff declared against him. There the judgment is not, let John answer over, but, let the plaintiff recover against John. He has pleaded a fact that is proved to be false, and judgment is against him. The damages there ought to be assessed by the jury who are empannelled to try the issue. In an action on the case on several promises for goods sold and and delivered, the defendant pleaded a misnomer of his Christian name in abatement; the plaintiff replied that the defendant was generally known by A B, as well as by B C. On this issue was joined, and the jury found for the plaintiff. The judge said, "We are of opinion the judgment must be peremptory." A peremptory plea, more commonly called a plea in bar, is one which states some ground for barring; that is, for putting a complete stop to the action of the plaintiff. It is an answer to the statement contained in the declaration, shewing that the plaintiff has not in fact any right of action such as he has alleged. Pleas in bar are of two kinds: a plea by way of traverse, and a plea by way of confession and avoidance. A plea by way of traverse is one that denies some material averment contained in the declaration. Some of these pleas had formerly an extensive operation: nil debet in debt, and non assumpsit in assumpsit. This was denominated the general issue, because it denied generally the liability of the plaintiff, and put him on the proof of all the facts necessary to establish the case. In case, "not guilty" put in issue, at least, all the facts stated in the declaration necessary in order to make out the guilt of the defendant. Not guilty, in trespass, denies the whole of the trespass itself; formerly it denied much more. For instance, trespass quare clausum fregit, where the plaintiff complained that the defendant broke his his close. Formerly, under this plea, the defendant might have relied on its not being the plaintiff's close, or on the defendant himself not having committed the trespass. Now, the plea of not guilty means only to deny that the defendant committed the trespass; it does not put in issue whether the close was the property of the plaintiff or not. There was also the plea of non est factum (it is not my deed), which was the plea in covenant, or in debt, or specialty; it not only put in issue whether the deed was ever executed, but admitted almost any defence which shewed the deed could not have been sued on at the time the action was brought. The term general issue was applied to those pleas at the time when they were of much more extensive application than at present. (b)

The ancient rules of pleading were thought to lead to chicanery and delay, and, in consequence of that, the defendant was no longer required to set out the whole of his defence, but was allowed to plead the general issue, and then to make any defence he chose under it. In an action of assumpsit, a plea of non assumpsit not only put the plaintiff on proof of the whole case, but allowed the defendant to set up, without any notice, almost any other matter in confession or avoidance, such as infancy, duress, or illegality—or matter in discharge, as payment or a release. Payment might formerly have been given under a plea of non assumpsit. Non assumpsit would seem to imply that the promise was never made; but you might under that plea give evidence that the liability had been cancelled by payment. This might be convenient for the defendant, but a great hardship on the plaintiff. The record also gave to the judge no intimation of the point in dispute between the parties, but left him to collect it on the trial from the facts. It is of great advantage to the judge to have the points in issue directed to his mind, so that he may see at once how the evidence bears upon them, and be enabled to direct the attention of the jury accordingly. When so many defences could be made under the special issue, the points were not raised by the pleadings. A total change has recently been brought about in this respect, not, however, a change effected by substituting any new theory of pleading—the principles are the same as they have ever been. Some of these had, in practice, been relaxed, but the relaxtion was found to produce more mischief than convenience. By the 3 & 4 Wm. 4, authority was given to the judges in the superior courts to make rules of pleading which, after having been laid before Parliament, should have the force and effect of an Act of Parliament. (See the rules of Hilary Term, 4 Wm. 4.) Among the objects contemplated by these rules was that of restraining within proper limits the general issue. Numerous rules were framed, suited to the several forms of action. In debt on simple contract, the plea of nil debet would raise the question whether the defendant was indebted to the plaintiff at the time the action was commenced. This plea was abolished, and non quam indebitatus substituted for it. This denies that the defendant was ever indebted to the plaintiff in respect of the cause of action stated in the declaration. Thus, an action is brought against a man for 40*l*. which he owes for goods sold and delivered; he says he was never so indebted—that is, he never was indebted for any such goods. This is, in effect, a denial that the goods had been sold and delivered. Before the new rules, under the plea of nil debet, this defence might have been set up; so also might any defence which shewed that at the time the action was brought, there was no debt existing; thus, he might shew payment before the action commenced. But now the plea is, he never was indebted, and the question, therefore, simply is, whether there ever was a debt created in the manner described in the declaration. If the defence is, that he has paid it, or that it has been released, or that it has been done away with in any other manner, that must be pleaded under some other plea. In an action of debt for money lent, if the defendant pleads never indebted, by this plea he denies the lending of the money, and the question raised is whether the money was lent or not. If the defendant has any other answer to the action, he must avail himself of it in some other way. In an action of assumpsit, except in actions on bills of exchange or promissory notes, the plea of non assumpsit is still retained; its operation differs according to the circumstances, depending on the nature of the action. Suppose an action is brought to recover damages on an executory agreement, that is, an agreement such as, if under seal, would be sued on in an action of covenant; there, if the defendant pleads non assumpsit, he denies that he ever made the agreement. In actions of indebitatus assumpsit, in which it is alleged that the defendant, being indebted to the plaintiff, promised to pay him; if the defendant pleads non assumpsit—that he did not promise —in this case he thereby denies not the promise, but the matter of fact from which the promise is sought to be inferred. The effect of non assumpsit in indebitatus assumpsit is the same as never indebted in an action of debt. In actions of assumpsit for a breach of duty, now, the effect of non assumpsit is nearly the same. So that there are three classes of cases in respect of which the plea of non assumpsit may be considered to be in force. First, it means a denial of the debt: in a special agreement it means no such agreement was made; in an action of assumpsit for breach of duty, it means that the fact from which the duty arose never took place; in trespass, quare clausum fregit, if the defendant pleads not guilty, he denies having committed the alleged trespass; in a case of trespass for damaging goods, if the defendant pleads not guilty, he denies that he damaged the goods in the manner alleged. There are cases in which either an action of assumpsit or an action on the case may be brought. For instance, an action against a carrier for not safely carrying goods; if it is an action of assumpsit, and the defendant pleads the general issue that he did not promise, that means that the goods were never delivered to him to be carried. If the action is on the case for not delivering the goods, and he pleads the general issue, "not guilty," that means the goods were delivered to him, but that he was not guilty of negligence. In an action of covenant on a deed brought on a specialty, if the defendant pleads non est factum, he thereby denies, simply, ever having executed the deed in question; but if he means to say that by duress he was forced into it, or that by fraud he was entrapped into it, or any thing else, he must plead that specially.

If the defendant pleads by way of traverse, that is, if he simply denies that which is stated in the declaration of the plaintiff, the point in dispute is ascertained. The defendant concludes his plea thus: "And of this he puts himself upon the country;" it only then remains for the the plaintiff in his replication to say "and the plaintiff doth the like," and the cause is ready. If the defence it is intended to make to the action in fact amount to the general issue, it ought to be pleaded in this form: in trespass for an assault, the defendant must plead, not that he did not commit the assault, but that he was not guilty. If a man is sued on a bond, and his defence is that the bond declared on is essentially different from the one he executed, he then pleads non est factum; that is, the bond declared on is not his deed.(c) It would be a bad plea to plead that he made a different bond; the answer simply to the action is, "The bond declared on is not mine." Again, a man sues for work and labour done in curing smoky chimneys, to be paid for on request; if the answer of the defendant is, that the plaintiff undertook to work on the terms "no cure, no pay;" and that the chimneys were not cured; the proper form of plea is the general issue, non assumpsit. The defendant may have made a promise, but he did not make the promise set out in the declaration. (Hayselden v. Staff, 5 A. & E. 153.) If there is, in the declaration, any particular statement which the defendant wishes to deny, he must do it by some plea. There is another form of denial, known as a special traverse; thus, in an action of covenant for non-payment of rent, the declaration is that E. B., the plaintiff's father, was seised in fee, and that he demised by deed to the defendant, and at his death the plantiff became entitled as heir; the plea is, that E. B. was seised for life, absque hoc, that he was seised in fee. The plea consists of two points. The fact on which the defendant relies is contained in the inducement, namely, that the father's interest in the property determined at his death. This, however, would be only an indirect denial of the plaintiff's title, and, therefore, under the absque hoc, a direct denial is added. The plea concludes to the country, and the question raised for trial is the fact denied on the absque hoc—was the father seised in fee or not? If he was seised in fee, the plaintiff is entitled; if otherwise, he is not. (Brudnell v. Roberts, 2 Wilson, 143; Williams's Saunders, 119.) That was a case in which an action was brought on a covenant, and the plea was, the lessor was only tenant for life.(d) That was held to be a good plea. (See also, Harrington v. Bishop of Lichfield, 4 B. N. C. 77.)

(c) Stephen on Pleading, 419.

There are two cases I have not referred to, because they are not connected with civil proceedings, but they relate to pleas in abatement. (King v. Shears, 3 State Trials, 267; and King v. Kirwan, ibid. 576.) They are very interesting, as having reference to what has been going on lately. They are both pleas in abatement in respect of the qualifications of the grand jurors by whom the bill of indictment was found. It seems pretty clear, from one of these cases, that when a copy of an indictment was given, the caption was a formal part of the indictment in which the names of the grand jury were mentioned. In the case of the King v. Shears, the objection was that one of the jurors was not a natural-born subject—an alien, and therefore did not possess the qualification required by law. Both of these cases ended in demurrer, and in both judgment was for the Crown against the defendant, respondeat ouster. In civil proceedings, if the issue is on a fact, and it is found against the defendant on a plea in abatement, that is final; it is otherwise in felonies.

The Acts to amend the Law of Imprisonment for Debt and Insolvency, and to facilitate Arrangements between Debtors and Creditors (7 & 8 Vict. c. 96 and 70); with Explanatory Observations, Analysis, and copious Index; together with the Insolvent Debtors' Act of 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 116), the Rules of the Court, Forms of Schedules, Fees, &c. By MORDAUNT L. WELLS, of the Middle Temple, Esq. Barrister-at-Law. London, 1844. Simpkin, Marshall, and Co.

IT would have been well if these Acts had not come into operation for a few weeks after the end of the session, so that those whose duty it is to carry them into execution, and advise upon their effect, might have had full time to consider all the bearings of the new enactments. As it is, however, the Profession will be the more glad to find that the trouble necessary to master the Acts has been much lessened by the timely publication of the first-mentioned edition of them by Mr. HOMES. His object has been, not only to give, in the clearest possible form, the new enactments, but, by references to the previous Acts and the cases upon them, greatly to assist the practitioner in their correct interpretation and application.

He divides his work into seven parts. The first contains the Law and Practice of Insolvency in the Court of Bankruptcy, under the subdivisions of "The Insolvent," "The Assignees," "Audit and Dividend," "Judges and Commissioners," "Stamp and Auction Duty," "Fees," "Costs," and "Power of Committal." Part II. contains the Amendments in the Law of Bankruptcy. Part III. The Amendments in the Law of Imprisonment for Debt and Execution.

On the important 57th section, he observes:—

"It will be observed that this section refers only to judgments; consequently it does not prevent arrest upon any decrees or orders of courts of equity, or rules of courts of common law, for payment of any sum of money or costs, although less than twenty pounds.

"The judgment referred to is a judgment obtained in an action for the recovery of a debt, and the section does not in any manner affect the power of taking the person in execution upon a judgment in any other action than an action for the recovery of a debt.

"The amount of debt for which the action was brought is not the criterion, but the amount of debt which is actually recovered: if the sum recovered do not exceed twenty pounds, the plaintiff cannot take his debtor in execution; consequently it seems that where a defendant signs judgment of nonpros against a plaintiff for the whole cause of action, in an action for the recovery of a debt, he may take plaintiff's body in execution for his costs, however small.

"The party against whom judgment may be recovered cannot be taken in execution, however vexatiously he may have defended the action, or however large the amount of costs he may have caused the plaintiff to incur, if the amount recovered shall not exceed twenty pounds.

He aptly compares it to the 48 Geo. 3, c. 123, and gives the principal cases upon that Act by way of illustration. It is to be remarked that the word "damages" is omitted in the new Act, and this will give rise to numerous difficulties. It is very doubtful, for instance, whether it would apply to an action in assumpsit on a special count. No specified debt is demanded, and no particulars need be given, and the plaintiff recovers "damages," not a debt. Possibly instead of declaring in an executed consideration, as is now so usual, special counts may be used instead.

Mr. HOMES then gives an analysis of the Debtors and Creditors Act (Part IV.), and the practice and forms in cases of insolvents petitioning the Court of Bankruptcy (Part V.). The rules and orders in insolvency (Part VI.), and the new statute at full length, are then inserted. To the whole book is a very copious and excellent index.

In size and type this edition is the same as the previous volume of the LAW TIMES series of important statutes; and we have little doubt that it will be equally successful. Its form and appearance are good, while the plan is excellent and well worked out.

The edition by Mr. WELLS is not so large or complete a work as that by Mr. HOMES. It is also somewhat differently arranged, but is nevertheless a useful little volume.

He gives an analysis of each Act, but has separated the index to the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 74, from the index to the rest of the volume, which is in some degree inconvenient. From his introductory observations we extract the following:—

"Another difficulty has been surmised as to the effect of this clause in an action brought to recover a debt exceeding twenty pounds, in which the defendant pays a sum of money into court, which reduces the sum sought to be recovered below twenty pounds. In such case, it has been suggested that the plaintiff would have no remedy against the person of the defendant for the remainder of the debt. It is, however, conceived that this view of the case is not the correct one, inasmuch as the abolition of arrest has relation to the amount recovered in the action, and not to the sum awarded by the jury, which is always exclusive of the money paid into court. But the money so paid into court is clearly a part of the sum recovered in the action, and consequently has not the effect of reducing the debt below twenty pounds, so as to deprive the plaintiff of his remedy against the person of the defendant."

This conclusion is, however, open to great doubt, and the Interpretation Clause must be borne in mind, which enacts that it is to be construed in the most beneficial manner for promoting the ends intended by 5 & 6 Vict. 116 and the present Act.

NECROLOGY.

SIR WILLIAM HEYGATE.

On Thursday, between one and two o'clock, intelligence was received at the Town-clerk's office of the death of Sir William Heygate, who was elected about a year and a half ago to the office of Chamberlain, after a contest with Sir John Pirie. Sir William Heygate had been in a declining state of health for some time. Indeed, about six months after his appointment to this lucrative situation fears were entertained by his friends that he would not much longer survive the contest, which had evidently, by the anxieties it had created, prostrated his bodily strength. The intelligence, of course, caused a great deal of excitement amongst the friends of the several gentlemen who are expected to be candidates. We understand that the following are candidates:—Aldermen Brown, Sir John Key, Pirie, and Humphrey, and Mr. Daniel Whittle Harvey, the Commissioner of the City Police.

JOURNAL OF PROPERTY.

THE MONEY MARKET.

FRIDAY.—A considerable amount of business has been transacted in the Funds to-day. The prices of French Stock having come lower from Paris, the market for Consols opened rather heavily this morning. At one period the price for Money and the Account was at 98¼, but at the present moment an advance has taken place to 98½ for the Account, and to 98⅜ for Money. The commissioners bought 5,000*l.* Consols at 98⅛. This is the pay-day in the last Consol Account. The differences have been well met. The premium upon Exchequer Bills is rather heavy. Bank and Indian Stock are much the same as yesterday.

The Foreign Account was settled this morning, and with but a slight obstruction. The Portuguese Converted Bonds have fallen to 43⅞; Spanish Consols to 22⅛ ¼; and the Three per Cents. to 33. There is a shade of reaction also in the Dutch and Belgian Funds. South American Bonds are steady.

The Share Market has presented a rather more steady appearance to-day, as the list of quotations will shew. French shares are a trifle flatter. London and Birmingham, 218 to 20; New Quarter Shares, 25 to 6; New Thirds, 36½ to 7½; South Western, 84 to 5; Eighths, 3½ to ⅞ prem.; London and Brighton, 47⅞ to 8⅛ per share; New, 12 to ¼; Blackwall, 7 to ¼; Greenwich, 8½ to ¾; Croydon, 18¾ to 19¼; Manchester and Leeds, 121 to 3; New, 51½ to 2½; Quarter Shares, 10½ to 11½; Manchester and Birmingham, 52 to 3; Birmingham and Derby, 74 to 6; Midland Counties, 104 to 6; Edinburgh and Glasgow, 65 to [illegible]; New, 16 to ½; Great Western, 136½ to 7½; Half Shares, 82½ to 3½; Fifths, 24½ to ¾; South Eastern, 37¾ to 8; New, 7¾ to 8 prem.; Northern and Eastern, 56 to 7 per share; Eastern Counties, 11⅞ to ⅞; New, 13 to ¼; Extension, 1 to ½ prem.; Norwich and Brandon, 13½ to 14 per share; Yarmouth and Norwich, 27 to 8; Birmingham and Gloucester, 108 to 10; Bristol and Exeter, 79 to 81; Bristol and Gloucester, 52 to 4; Lancaster and Carlisle, 5¾ to 6¼; Chester and Holyhead, 6¼ to ¾; Paris and Orleans, 36½ to 7; Paris and Rouen, 36½ to 7½; Rouen and Havre, 7½ to 8½ prem.

In Joint-Stock Banks—British North American, 42½.

Considerable sales of estates have been effected within the last fortnight by Messrs. Farebrother, Clark, and Lye, the Octon estate, in Yorkshire, for 79,000*l.*; the Hook Norton estate, in Oxfordshire, for 15,000 guineas; the manor of Hook Norton, 1,290*l.*; a portion of the Dunston Hall estate, in Norfolk, 4,000*l.*; the Ludgershall estate in Wiltshire, 12,500*l.*; the Chelsfield Court Lodge estate, in Kent, 17,000*l.*; besides numerous smaller properties to the extent of nearly 60,000*l.*

HOUSE OF LORDS.

September 2 and 4.

GRAY v. THE QUEEN.

Right to peremptory challenge notwithstanding offence is not capital.

The question at issue here was the right of defendants in Ireland to peremptory challenge of the jury in felonies not punishable with death. Gray was tried at the Monaghan Assizes in 1843 for shooting at a person named Cunningham with intent to kill. Gray peremptorily challenged nine of the jurors as they were called to the book, but the Court disallowed the challenge. Gray was convicted and sentenced to transportation for life. The question now came before the House of Lords on a writ of error.

Wightman, J. Coltman, J. Williams, J. Patteson, J. Gurney, B. Pollock, C. B. and Tindal, C. J. severally gave their opinions in favour of the defendant's right to challenge. Parke, B. considered that it was properly disallowed, as the right to peremptory challenge was in his opinion confined to cases in which the defendants' lives were in jeopardy.

On Wednesday, the Lord Chancellor and Lords Brougham and Campbell gave their opinions in accordance with those of the majority of the judges, and upon the motion of the Lord Chancellor the judgment below was reversed, and a venire de novo ordered to be issued by the Court below.

Judgment reversed; venire de novo awarded.

We have been obliged to postpone a fuller report of the opinions of the judges until next week, in consequence of the length of our report of O'Connell's case.

O'Connell v. The Queen.

On Monday the judges gave their opinions upon the questions that had been propounded to them.

The questions are given in Lord Chief Justice Tindal's opinion. His lordship said—

My Lords, the first question proposed by your lordships for the consideration of her Majesty's judges is this, namely—"Are all, or any, and if any, which, of the counts in the indictment bad in law, so that, if such count or counts stood alone in the indictment, no judgment against the defendants could properly be entered upon them?" That is, in other words, are all the counts framed with sufficient legal certainty? In order to constitute a conspiracy, it is necessary that two or more individuals shall enter into an agreement or understanding together, to effect something unlawful, or if not unlawful, that they shall thus agree together to effect some lawful object by unlawful means. That the offence of conspiring was one unknown to the common law previously to the law by which it was recognized, passed in the 33rd of Edward I. is a fact. But that law only professes to give a definition of the word conspiracy; and it has always been held to be the gist of the law, that a breach of the law took place whenever a conspiracy was proved to exist, whether or not any act was performed in pursuance of such agreement by conspirators. This is the interpretation put upon the law by the decision of the Court in Rex v. Edwards, in Salkeld's Reports. We have no doubt as to the sufficiency of the first five counts. Nor is there any doubt on our minds that an agreement and understanding between divers persons to raise discontents, and excite disaffections, and to stir up jealousies, hatred, and ill-will amongst and between certain classes of her Majesty's subjects, and more especiall to excite amongst her Majesty's subjects in Ireland feelings of ill-will and hostility towards her Majesty's subjects in other parts of the United Kingdom, and especially in England, which charges were found in each of the five counts which first occurred in the indictment, did form a distinct and definite charge in each against the separate defendants, of an agreement between them to do an illegal act. It therefore became unnecessary to consider the charge of conspiracy to do other acts which were alleged to be within the scope of the agreement. With respect, however, to the sixth and seventh counts, in the form in which they stood upon that record, all the judges concurred in the opinion that they did not state the illegal purpose and design of the agreement entered into between the defendants with such proper and sufficient certainty as to lead to the necessary conclusion that it was an agreement to do an act in direct violation of the law. Those two counts did in substance state in each of them the agreement of the defendants to have been to cause and procure divers subjects to meet together in large numbers, for the unlawful and seditious purpose of obtaining, by means of the intimidation to be thereby caused, and by means of the exhibition and demonstration of great physical force at such meetings, changes in the government, laws, and constitution of the realm. Now, though it might be inferred from these counts that the object of the defendants was, probably, illegal, yet it did not appear to them to be so alleged with sufficient certainty. The word "intimidation" was not a technical word, it was not vocabulum artis, having necessarily a meaning in a bad sense. It was a word in common use, employed, on this occasion, in its popular sense, and, in order to give it any force, it ought at least to appear, from the context, what species of fear was intended, or upon whom such fear was intended to operate. But these counts contained no intimation whatever upon what persons this intimidation was intended to operate. It was left in complete uncertainty whether the intimidation was directed against the peaceable inhabitants of the surrounding places, against the subjects of the Queen dwelling in Ireland in general, against persons in the exercise of public authority, or against all the subjects of the realm. Again, to mere allegation that these changes were to be obtained by the exhibition and demonstration of large numbers, without looking to the using, or threatening to use, such numbers against any person or bodies of her Majesty's subjects, seemed to them (the judges) to be simply an allegation that there had been an exhibition or display of numbers of persons, without being carried further. As to the eighth, ninth, and tenth counts, we all agree that the objects of the agreement entered into between the defendants as stated in those counts, and the attainment of those objects as alleged, is a violation of the laws of the land. We consider it unnecessary to give the reasons at length for this conclusion. As to the eleventh count, we have no doubt that it is sufficient. On the sixth and seventh counts all the judges are agreed that had they stood alone no judgment could be maintained upon a verdict obtained upon them. The second question was, "Is there any, and if any, what defect, in the finding of the jury upon the trial of the said indictment, and the entering of such finding upon the record?" On this question we all agree that the finding on the first, second, third, and fourth counts was not supportable in law. In respect to the first and second counts, we hold the finding to be bad, on the ground that the jury found the whole eight defendants guilty of a joint conspiracy on each of these counts; but they found certain of the eight defendants guilty of other and separate conspiracies under the same counts. The finding on the third count is bad, because the jury found three of the defendants guilty of all the charges, all the defendants guilty of certain other of the charges, and all, except Thomas Tierney, guilty of others. On the fourth count they found that all were guilty of all the charges except Thomas Tierney, who was guilty of part only. Our reason for this opinion was that there was only one unlawful agreement charged in each count, and therefore the jury could only find one unlawful agreement on each separate count: for although it was competent in the jury to find them guilty of different acts on different counts, it was not competent for the jury to find all the defendants guilty of one unlawful object, and some of them guilty of other unlawful purposes, where all were charged as one conspiracy in the same count, for this would be a finding of several conspiracies on a count which only charged one. (See Rex v. Dempsey, Russ. & Ry. C. C.) On these four counts, therefore, the entry upon the record is bad in law, and cannot be supported. The third question is, "Whether it was the opinion of her Majesty's judges that there was any sufficient ground for reversing the indictment, by means of any defect in the indictment, or of the finding, or entering of the findings of the jury, upon the said indictment?" On this there is a difference of opinion, and I can only give my own. It involves, to a considerable extent, the same points as the eleventh question. I have first looked at it as a question whether, upon an indictment containing separate counts, a verdict being obtained and a judgment passed on one count only, such judgment could be reversed by reason of a defect existing in one or more of the remaining counts. On this I conceive it to be the law, that if there be one good count in the indictment, and that the defendants be found guilty generally, and under that verdict be brought up to receive judgment, such judgment cannot be reversed by any proceedings upon a writ of error because one or more of the other counts are bad. The practice in civil cases is different, because the verdict, being for damages, rests both upon the bad and good counts, and the Court cannot determine how much was given in respect of one or the other. But there is no analogy between the two cases. All that a criminal jury has to do, is to say whether a defendant is guilty or not. There is nothing for them to assess, nor any amount of guilt or damage to award or pronounce upon. The Court does all that, and pronounces a sentence of punishment upon the whole or part of the record, the judgment being guided either by the statute law, which awards certain punishments for certain offences, or else, if the punishment be discretionary, the Court pronounces sentence of its own authority. So that if one count be good, it is sufficient to sustain a verdict, and that verdict consequently is legally followed up by punishment, statutory or discretionary, according as the law indicates the nature of the thing itself. I think there is no principle of law by which a judgment so obtained can be reversed upon a writ of error because one of the counts is bad. The object of several counts in indictments is not to charge two offences, but to describe the offence in different ways, so as to bring it within the laws. The corpus delicti is the same. Suppose, then, after verdict upon such indictment, with a good and bad count and a writ of error to be brought, it would be against all reason to reverse the verdict and release the party convicted, however clear his guilt. On a misdemeanor, indeed, several counts are allowed, charging several distinct offences, but the result is the same as in a criminal case; for the moment a discretionary punishment has been awarded by virtue of the verdict, whether that sentence was guided by one or more of the counts, the discretionary power invested in the judge confirms the punishment as a fixed judgment, and in a court of error a man has no more right to presume that such a judgment is wrong because one or more of the counts are unsustainable, than he would have a plea for denying the sentence of the Court in a case of felony to be definitive where the judge held one count in the indictment to be good. The second form in which I have separately viewed this question is, whether, if all the counts in the indictment be good, and the finding only should be wrong, such finding affords a sufficient ground for reversing the judgment. I deem it unnecessary to trouble your lordships at any length. The effect of a bad finding on a good count is the same as if such a finding did not exist. This is altogether unimportant, for a good finding on a bad count will have the same effect, namely, to prevent any legal judgment; and for these reasons, I beg to offer my humble opinion that there is no sufficient ground for reversing the judgment by reason of any defect in the indictment or the finding. The question proposed fourthly by your lordships to her Majesty's judges is this,—"Is there any sufficient ground to reverse the judgment by reason of the matters stated in the pleas in abatement, or any of them, or in the judgments upon such pleas?"

My Lords, in answer to this question, I am requested by my brethren to say, that we all agree that judgment ought not to be reversed by reason of the matters stated in the pleas in abatement, or the judgments thereon. The law requires a plea in abatement, which is a dilatory plea, to be pleaded with certainty. It must be pleaded "with precise and strict exactness;" and that "it ought to be certain to every intent." And as this is the rule in civil actions, at least the same precision and strict exactness are necessary to a plea in abatement in any proceeding at the suit of the Crown. But in the present instance the plea fails in precision in many particulars. The names of the unsworn witnesses on whose evidence the true bill was found are not given in the plea; there is no averment that the bill was not found on the evidence of other witnesses sworn besides those alleged to have been examined without being sworn; and, lastly, the four witnesses on whose evidence the bill was found a true bill might have been authorized by law to give their evidence on affirmation instead of oath. These pleas, therefore, appear to us to be bad. The question, fifthly, proposed by your lordships to her Majesty's judges is this:—"Is there any sufficient ground for reversing the judgment on account of the continuing the trial in the vacation or of the order of the Court for that purpose?" The facts on which this question arises are these—the venire was made returnable on the 15th of January, the cause was therefore properly continued till that day, being a day in Hilary Term. The Court made an order that the issues joined should be tried at bar on the 15th of January, but before that day arrives—namely, on Saturday, the 13th of January—the following order was made:—"That in case the trial, so fixed as aforesaid for January 15, in the same Term, should not terminate on or before the 31st day of January, being the last day of the same Hilary Term, then, that Thursday, the 1st day of February, and every succeeding day until the 15th of April next, or so many days as may be necessary for that purpose, be appointed for the continuation of the said trial, and that the days so fixed shall accordingly, for the purpose of such trial, be, and be deemed and be taken to be, a part of the same Hilary Term." The objection taken is, that the order is conditional only, and that it is not for the appointment, but for the continuation only, of the trial. The order, however, appears to us to be clearly within the scope and meaning of the Act, and the power which was exercised by the Court was well exercised. The statute warranted the Court in appointing such day or days as it should think fit. The order was sufficient, and by all her Majesty's judges this question is answered in the negative. The question, sixthly, put to the judges, is, "Whether there was any sufficient ground for reversing the judgment on account of the judgment of the Court overruling and disallowing the challenges to the array, or any or either of them, or of the matters stated in such challenges?" The ground, and the only ground, on which challenge to the array is allowed by law, is the unindifference or default of the sheriff. But no unindifference or default of the sheriff or his officers was assigned on this occasion. The array of the panel is here challenged on the ground that the general list from which the jurors' book is made up had not been completed in every respect according to the statute, but that, on the contrary, "the names of 59 persons duly qualified to serve on that jury for the county of the city of Dublin were omitted from the general list, and from the special jurors' book of the said county;" but the challenge contained no allegation against the sheriff or any of his subordinate officers. The challenge of each of the defendants alleges, indeed, that a list purporting to be a general list, was illegally and fraudulently made out by some person or persons unknown; and the challenge of T. Steele states further, that the names were left out for the purpose of prejudicing him in the trial of the cause by some person or persons unknown. But there is not the most distant suggestion that the sheriff was in fault. The ground, therefore, on which challenge to the array is given by law does not apply to the present case. The statute has, in fact, taken from the sheriff the duty of selecting jurymen, which the ancient law imposed on him, and substituted instead a new machinery in the hands of certain officers, by whom the list is to be prepared for the sheriff's use. If the sheriff, when the jurors' book was presented to him, had acted improperly in selecting the names of the jury from the book, such misconduct would have been a good cause of challenge to the array; but the complaint is, that the materials of the book out of which the jury were selected by the sheriff, and for which the sheriff is not responsible, had been improperly composed; it is not, therefore, a ground of challenge to the array. And further, it is manifest no object or advantage could have been gained if the challenge had been allowed; for if it had been allowed, the jury process must have been directed to some other officer, who would have been obliged to choose his jury out of the very same special jurors' book on which the sheriff had acted, for there was no other. There would have been the same objection to that panel, and so on toties quoties, so that the granting of this challenge would have effectually prevented any trial at all. The very same difficulty would occur in England: if through accident, carelessness, or design, a single jury list, directed to be returned by the overseers from any parish, were not handed over to the clerk of the peace, or if a single name were omitted in any list actually delivered to him, the jury list in either case would be defectively made up; but if that deficiency were allowed to be a ground of challenge to the array, the business of every assize in the kingdom would be effectually stopped. That there must be some mode of relief for an injury which arises from non-observance of an Act of Parliament is undeniable; but the only question before us is, whether this is a ground of challenge to the array? We all agree that it is not. The next question, the seventh, put to the judges is, "Whether there was sufficient ground to reverse the judgment by reason of any defect in the entry of continuances of the said trial to the 15th day of April, regard being also had to the appearances of the defendants on the said last-named day?" A case after the return of the jury process might be continued either by adjournment, if the Court had not met, or by curia advisari vult, if it had met, but required time to consider the question. This was a peculiar case; it was a trial at bar. The 1 & 2 Wm. 4, c. 31 regulated it, but in some respects it became impossible to comply with the statute. That impossibility prevented the things done being void within the statute; and in the present case, it never could be said the cause had ceased. There was, in fact, a parliamentary continuance of the cause. In this we all concur. The eighth question is this:—"Is there any sufficient ground to reverse or vary the judgment on account of the sentences, or any or either of them, passed on the respective defendants, regard being had particularly to the recognizances required and to the period of imprisonment dependent upon the entering into such recognizances?" The only difficulty arises on the form of the order for entering into recognizances with respect to the time at which the term of seven years is to commence. There is nothing on the record to shew that the recognizances ordered are illegal, for unless they appear manifestly unreasonable as to the sum fixed, or the time for which they are required, a court of error has no authority to interfere. The defendants may, by entering into their recognizances instanter, shorten the term to six years after the term of imprisonment shall have ceased; and it is to be presumed when the sentences were passed, the court below formed a proper judgment of the situation, means, and circumstances of the several defendants. There is no illegality in an order for recognizances to commence after a term of imprisonment which is in itself uncertain, being dependent on a fine. Therefore, the eighth question should be answered in the negative. The ninth question put to the Queen's judges is this:—"Is there any sufficient ground to reverse the judgment on account of the judgments on the assignments of error coram nobis, or any or either of them, or of the matters stated in such assignments of error, or any or either of them?" The errors in fact assigned in the writs of error coram nobis by each of the defendants (except Mr. Steele) are the same, viz.—that the bill of indictment was found and returned a true bill by the grand jury on the evidence of divers witnesses, whose names are enumerated, and of no other persons; and that none of the witnesses previous to examination before the grand jury were sworn in the King's Bench, as required by the 56 Geo. 3, c. 87, nor were they lawfully bound by affirmation or declaration to give true evidence before the said grand jury. In the writ of error brought by Thomas Steele, the error assigned is this—that the indictment was not found according to the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 37, inasmuch as on the back of the indictment there appeared neither the names of the witnesses nor the name of the foreman, nor his initials, authenticating the fact that the said witnesses had been sworn or made their affirmation or declaration before they were examined. As to the non-compliance with the 56 Geo. 3, c. 87, the answer appears to be, that the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 37 operates as a virtual repeal of the former, as well in the Court of Queen's Bench as in the other courts of criminal jurisdiction in Ireland. If the question had been res integra, a doubt might have been entertained on the construction of the statute whether the Court of Queen's Bench and the Commission Court of Dublin had not been omitted by mistake. But we know that the Irish judges have held the practice here objected to correct, and as there are words in the statute to warrant it, we think the decision is to be supported. From the preamble of the Act, it might be expected that the alteration about to be enacted would be general, and without exception, and the enacting words accordingly were, that in cases of indictment where bills were to be laid before a grand jury in Ireland, the clerk of the Crown at assizes, and the clerk of the peace at the sessions, should make an indorsement thereon directly. To give this enactment its full force, that was, to make it applicable to all cases, those particular officers must be taken to be named only by way of example or instances, and it must not be supposed that the statute was applicable to those courts only of which those persons were the proper officers. It would be a novel mode of introducing a restriction in the words of a remedial Act, to confine it to these courts only, in consequence of those particular officers being named. The clerk of the peace at sessions and the clerk of the Crown at assizes, held offices and performed duties analogous to each other, and that construction of the Act received further confirmation from the enactment, that the oath directed to be administered was not to be in addition to, but in lieu of the oath formerly administered. Upon a reasonable construction of the statute, we think that this ground of objection was answered. And as to the assignment of error in facts assigned by Thomas Steele, it was founded on a part of the Act which was directory and not essential. I do not think, after a witness had been in reality fully sworn and examined, and a true bill returned on his evidence, that it would deprive the Act of its legal operation, if it was found that the foreman had neglected to comply with certain of its directions. The ninth question we all concur in answering in the negative. The tenth question put was this—"Is there any sufficient ground for reversing the judgment by reason of its not containing any entry as to the verdicts of acquittal?" After a careful search made at the Crown-office, no instance of such an entry could be found where a party was found guilty of one part of the indictment on which he received judgment, and this practice they thought was in conformity with law, for it appeared from Lord Hale that an entry of acquittal quod eat sine die might be entered for the defendant even after a writ of error had been brought. We are all of opinion, therefore, that the tenth question is to be answered in the negative. Upon the eleventh and last question, upon which I am delivering my own opinion only, I have, in answering the third question anticipated those observations which should otherwise apply here. That question is "11. In an indictment consisting of counts A, B, C, where the verdict is guilty of all generally, and the counts A and B are good, and the count C is bad, the judgment being, that the defendant, for the offences aforesaid, be fined and imprisoned, which judgment would be sufficient in point of law, if confined expressly to counts A and B—can such judgment be reversed on a writ of error? Will it make any difference whether the punishment be discretionary, as above suggested, or a punishment fixed by law?" I have already stated that the opinion at which we have already arrived is, that a general judgment upon the whole record is not to be reversed upon a writ of error by reason of one or more counts being bad. I have also stated my opinion that it would make no difference that the punishment was discretionary. The only portion, therefore, of this question remaining to be considered is, whether the entry on the record, being "that the defendants for the offences aforesaid be fined and imprisoned," is in itself a ground for reversing the judgment? That to which our attention has been called is, that the words should be that the defendant, "for his offences as aforesaid," be fined and imprisoned. The plain interpretation of these words is this—such offences as are set out in those counts of the indictment that are free from objection, and of which the defendants have been found guilty by a proper finding of the jury. These are the offences in the fifth, eighth, and all subsequent counts, and I see no objection to the word offences in the plural number. I do not think that, in point of law, the words as they appeared in the record formed a ground of objection. After the case of Rex v. Powell (2 B. & A. 75), it would be difficult to maintain a different opinion. I therefore think that this question also—but I offer it as my own humble opinion—is to be answered altogether in the negative.

PATTESON, J. after stating his concurrence as to the first and second counts, and stating the third and eleventh questions to be in fact one, observed upon the recognized distinction between verdicts in civil and criminal cases, and said that he believed that this was the first time that such an analogy between civil and criminal cases had been set up; the practice had certainly been to pass sentence generally in all cases of felony, whatever number of counts there were in the indictment; and he was not aware of any instance in which a writ of error had been brought in any case of felony, on the ground of there being one bad count in the indictment. He then referred to Rex v. Young (3 T. Rep. 98) and Rex v. Powell (2 B. & Ad. 75), and concluded by saying, that assuming, then, that the judgment was bad on the first, second, third, sixth, and seventh counts, still it remained an entire and good judgment on the other counts of the indictment, and therefore the judgment could not be reversed.

MAULE, J. concurred.

COLTMAN, J.—I consider, in answer to the third question, that the judgment ought to be reversed, by reason of the defects of the indictment, and the defects of the finding of the jury and judgment thereon. As to the fourth question, in my humble opinion it seems to me, notwithstanding the existence of a contrary opinion in the profession at large, that where an indictment consists of three counts, A, B, and C, and counts A and B are good, count C bad, and judgment is given against the defendant for the offence charged, such judgment is insufficient in point of law, and ought to be reversed on error. Upon the latter part of the eleventh question, whether if the judgment be confined to the two good counts, A and B, and the defendant be sentenced thereon, the judgment is erroneous,—I answer that if it appear on what count the judgment was pronounced, the judgment is substantially just, though untechnical, which cannot be predicated of the judgment in the present case. The judgment ought therefore to be reversed.

WILLIAMS, J. GURNEY, B. and ALDERSON, B. severally concurred in the opinion that the judgment ought to be affirmed.

PARKE, B. delivered his opinion in a very low tone of voice, but the substance of it was, that he was now satisfied that the supposed distinction between civil and criminal cases had no solid foundation, and that although not without much doubt and hesitation, he had come to the opinion, in answer to the third and eleventh questions, that the judgment ought to be reversed.

TINDAL, C. J. put in a written opinion of Coleridge, J. (who was prevented by illness from attending), in which he concurred with the majority.

The House of Lords then adjourned until Wednesday, September 4.

Wednesday, Sept. 4.

The LORD CHANCELLOR stated the various points of the case with his usual clearness and precision, and gave his reasons for concurring with the majority of the judges—but our report must be confined to a summary. He said, that unless their lordships believed the opinions of those judges to be palpably erroneous, the judgment ought to be affirmed. He commented strongly upon the non-appearance of error upon the record, and that to travel out of the record was in defiance of all legal principles. He shewed from the authorities that the alleged distinction between motions in arrest of judgment and writs of error did not exist, and that the force of the modern cases in writs of error was not weakened because the point was not taken by counsel; that the difficulty which was said would arise if the party so convicted subsequently pleaded autre fois acquit did not exist, because there would be no acquittal upon the same corpus delicti. He further remarked that the universal assent of the judges and the Bar to the position he laid down proved its correctness. He then referred briefly to the question of the challenge to the array, and expressed his strong opinion that the solitary opinion of Lord Denman was erroneous. After further giving his opinion upon the plea of abatement, he moved that the judgment should be affirmed.

Lord BROUGHAM followed.—He pointed out the great contrast between the weight of authority on one side and the doubts of Parke, B. and Coltman, J. and ably supported his opinion that the judgment should be affirmed.

Lord DENMAN now said, I have judged it to be the most convenient course to advert, in the commencement of the observations which I have to address to your lordships, to the objection taken by the traversers to the judgment of the court below, by which the demurrer brought by the Attorney-General to the challenge of the array was allowed by the judges. I am induced to do so principally because it is a matter of such high and undeniable importance to the people of this realm, as not to be susceptible of any exaggeration of the effects which it may hereafter produce in the administration of justice in the United Kingdom; for to my humble judgment it is of the most vital consequence that such a matter shall not be passed over without a due and sufficient remedy being provided, as otherwise a trial by jury, instead of being a protection to the party accused, would prove to be a mockery, a snare, and a delusion. The traversers to the indictment challenged the array, on the ground that there had been a fraudulent omission of sixty names from the lists of the jurors for the county of the city of Dublin. The Attorney-General demurs to this challenge, admitting at the same time the fact so challenged. I think the challenge ought to have been allowed. That also was the opinion of one of the learned judges of the Queen's Bench in Ireland, expressed with his characteristic diffidence, but also with firmness, and, I must say, it was supported by reasons which I think were not satisfactorily combated or answered by the majority of the learned judges who decided the point. I disagree, my lords—speaking with the same diffidence on this subject as the learned judge did to whom I refer—from the opinions you have heard. With all deference to my noble friend on the woolsack, I think the principle was not, as stated, as to whether the sheriff had done right or wrong in the matter, but it was one which involved the deep and most important principle, whether the persons accused should have the security which the Constitution has provided, namely, that of a fair and impartially selected jury for their trial. I communicated with my brother Coleridge on the subject, who was unable fully to examine the books, but he was inclined to concur with me in thinking that the challenge ought to have been allowed. I consider the state of the law to be as follows:—The single duty which the sheriff has to perform is to collect the names of all those persons who are fit to form the jury of the city or county, and to enter them on the panel. This duty devolved upon the sheriff, singly and alone, in former times; but now it is conjointly performed by the assessed tax-collectors, the clerk of the peace at quarter sessions, and the recorder. The sheriff's functions differ from those of the tax-collectors, which are of a ministerial nature; whilst the recorder's duties in the matter are wholly judicial, he having to decide upon the rejection or admission of the names upon the jury-list, and afterwards to settle and sign the panel for the ensuing year. The charge brought in this matter is, that after the recorder had so exercised his proper functions with respect to the jury-list for the county of the city of Dublin, and after he had delivered the list to the proper officer, some one else had interfered and said, "No, that shall not be the list. This shall be the list, and from this shall your jury be selected." The simple act of the delivery of the list by the recorder to the sheriff is a ministerial one. That act was incorrectly done, the judicial part of the recorder's duties, which I have already described, having been most correctly performed. The challengers say, "You have deprived your judicial act of its authority; you have handed in an imperfect list of jurymen; and the book from which the names of the jury who are to try us are selected is not the book." I cannot help thinking, my lords, that if this point had been submitted to the judges during their late consultation, they would have found the objection raised by the challengers to the array valid. I do not think, my lords, that they would have found it a sufficient ground for coming to the decision which they have stated, to say that it is in respect only of the act of the sheriff that a challenge can be had. My noble and learned friend (Lord Brougham) stated that the objection raised by the challenge would apply only to the returning-officer. Who is the returning-officer? My lords, the recorder is the returning-officer in this case; and though I am far from imputing the blame of unworthy motives, or even from attributing the most distant motive to the learned person in question, still I must state it to be my profound and deliberate conviction that he was guilty of a default, by delivering a book to the sheriff as the jury book which he had already decided, in his judicial capacity, should not be the book. I have the misfortune, and so I feel it, to differ from my learned brother the Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas as to the principle upon which the challenge to the array is to be allowed, and I not only differ from him, but I also dissent entirely from the views propounded by the two noble and learned lords who have spoken upon the same point. I differ, moreover, from all my learned brethren who have been consulted by your lordships upon these questions as to the consequences which would arise in the event of the challenge to the array having been allowed. The learned Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas said that no object would be gained by the traversers, even if the challenge were allowed, for the jury-list would be referred or delegated to some other officer. I venture, with all deference, to say that such would not be the course of proceeding. The default was not in the sheriff, and therefore the return could not be taken out of his hands. The default lies with the recorder or the clerk of the peace, and it so exists in consequence of their having sent in an incorrect list, so that there would exist no reason whatever for calling upon any other person than the sheriff to form a new jury. If a venire de novo were to be allowed, and the book were found, it may be said that no future challenge of the array will be allowed; but I do not feel myself called upon to consider what may happen at a future time. All that I now desire to state is, that the Act expressly provides for the case in which no jury-book shall be found to have been returned to the sheriff. It is true the noble and learned lord on the woolsack has asserted that a book had been returned. For, said the noble and learned lord, "Here is the book;" but what says the Act? The Act, my lords, says otherwise. The book returned to the sheriff was not the book. It was an incorrect book, whereas the Act of Parliament requires that a correct book be returned. But, it has been urged that, if the omission of one name would vitiate the list, it would be impossible ever to form a proper jury-list, and the consequence would be, that no trials could be had of offenders. I think, my lords, if so humble an individual as myself had been present when this argument was suffered to prevail, my opinion would have had more weight than to have allowed it to pass. The learned Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas alleged, in his argument to your lordships, that according to the view of his learned brother Coleridge, the omission of one name by the tax-collectors would vitiate the entire jury-list. Now, let me remind your lordships, that after the lists have been prepared by the tax-collectors they are referred at the Court of Quarter Sessions to the recorder, who pronounces judicially upon them, omits or inserts names according to the proofs before him, and thus the list is finally constituted. But, my lords, if the omission of one name is considered according to this view to vitiate the list, what will be the effect of omitting 60? What the effect of leaving out 600? For I contend that each or either of these omissions would be equally beyond the reach of question, if this mode of viewing the point is admitted to be correct. The omission even of one name may, in my apprehension, prove very serious. The parties accused ought to be tried out of the book: if the traversers are satisfied with the jury, they will not challenge it; if they are dissatisfied, they will challenge it: and if it be discovered that the proper book has not been returned, then the former book of the preceding year may be resorted to. This, my lords, is the practice in England, and the law has been assimilated as closely to it in Ireland as the circumstances admitted of being done. The supposition entertained, therefore, by my learned brother the Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas with respect to the effect which the omission of one name would have after vitiating the list, I have proved to be wrong, as also the opinions of the majority of the judges of the Queen's Bench at Dublin. Very great injury may arise to the defendants about to be tried by the omission of names from the jury lists. But the learned Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, in adverting to this subject, says, that there must be some remedy for such an omission, if the Act of Parliament does not provide one. All the learned judges concur in this sentiment. So says the noble and learned lord on the woolsack. He said that the challengers were not without a remedy; my noble and learned friend assures you that they could set themselves right. What is this remedy, my lords? I waited for the noble and learned lord to explain himself. But he says that he will not tell us now. He puts it off until some future occasion. Now if we are to be told there is no remedy existing for this great wrong—if there is no means of preventing it, I must say that the consequence would be to create the greatest confusion and uncertainty in the proceedings of our criminal courts. But I say that unless the good old principle recognized by the practice of the courts and the constitution, that, namely, of challenging the array, be still permitted to prevail in all trials involving the criminality of the subject, there will be no security for a fair trial. Nor shall I ever believe that this great and long-recognized remedy for the evils in question does not still exist, until I find that it has been solemnly and deliberately repealed by law. The absence of all other remedy, my lords, proves that this remedy still exists, and is in full vigour; consequently the challenge to the array ought to have been allowed, and the trial was, in my humble opinion, erroneously suffered to proceed. There is a passage in Coke which fully bears out this view, and I can point out a case in the Year-book, where the case is twice reported, once under the 17 Edward 3, and a second time under the 20 Edward 3 (erroneously referred to by Mr. Hill at your lordships' bar as reported under the 50 Edward 3), wherein the sheriff having made an erroneous return of a jury-list to the bailiff of the hundred, it was argued that the defendant was deprived of his right of challenge as against the bailiff. It was alleged that there were good names enough on the list to form a jury, but it was argued and decided that an error, the omission of one individual, vitiated the whole list, and the proceedings were consequently set aside. In that case the sheriff was charged with unindifferency, for which he was tried and acquitted. I am certainly of opinion that the challenge ought to have been allowed. The other question to be decided is, whether the judgment can be supported. I will assume that there are only two bad counts, although I am not satisfied that all the others are good. The question, as I view it, is this:—A and B are good counts. C is a bad count. The Court has pronounced judgment on A, B, and C; that is, in respect to the offences charged in them. It appears to me, however, to be very contrary to common sense to say, that these offences are well laid in the indictment. It appeared to me at the time to be a very ingenious turn of language to say that. Here are three counts: the trial proceeds; evidence is had; a verdict is given on each; and the Court proceeds to say, for such said offences, so laid and described, I sentence you, the traversers, to a certain discretionary punishment. Now, then, my lords, it is extremely possible to conclude that in point of fact the Court did not take into account the bad counts as well as the good. We are told, however, we must assume that they pronounced their judgment on the good counts only. In the first place, I have a most serious objection to that conclusion, because it is in direct contradiction to notorious facts. What will your posterity and future students of the law say to our decision, if we will presume that the Court of Queen's Bench in Dublin passed its sentence on the good counts of the indictment only, at least those of the learned profession who go to practise in Dublin, and who take in the reports of the Court of Queen's Bench in Dublin, and there find a decision directly the contrary—because it was there moved in arrest of judgment that some of the counts of the indictment were bad, and the judges decided that they were good, and passed sentence upon that decision? Would not that Court, after having so decided, have grossly neglected its duty, if it had not acted upon that decision? This seems to me to put the question out of court. Not only is it against the notorious facts to assume that the judgment was passed only on the counts which are good, but it is against the plain meaning of the words, and against the common probabilities of every case. On this subject I must resort a little to my own experience, which has not been very slight; and I know the course that I should have taken,—I should have taken all the counts which were proved into my consideration in the judgment which I had passed. I quite agree with my right hon. and learned friend Mr. Baron Parke; he and Mr. Justice Coltman both stated that these were facts to be taken into consideration. I felt very great surprise when I heard that most able and ingenious argument addressed to the Court on the subject, and I confess I never entertained a doubt on the subject till that argument was stated. When such a doubt is raised, it is the duty of the Court of Error to consider whether that doubt is well founded or not.

His lordship then stated his views of the duty of the House of Lords, as an appellate jurisdiction, and that they were not to be bound by a course of authorities which, when examined, could not be supported. He considered that the dictum of Lord Mansfield was entitled to little weight. He says— "In cases of civil actions, where there is one good count and one bad, and the verdict is general and for damages, in that case the court above will be bound to set aside the verdict, because the damages are given for all the counts, and the court cannot say how much is given for the bad count, and how much for the good count." I deeply regret that it did not occur to my Lord Mansfield that he had a plain remedy in his own hands. He had nothing to do but to tell the jury to assess the damages on the several counts, and then the damages would have stood, so much for the counts which are good, and so much for those which are bad; and why my Lord Mansfield should have thought it necessary to say that the rule was entirely different in criminal cases I am entirely at a loss to conceive. There cannot be a doubt that the opinion of Lord Mansfield then gave has been considered law in Westminster-hall, and that several judges and barristers have expressed the same opinion, and have taken it for granted that it was so. If we look at the various columns of the law we shall find them raised on several foundations; a certain portion of their foundations are Acts of Parliament, a certain portion are decisions of the courts, a certain portion are the dicta of judges, and a certain portion are taken for granted; and there is a great deal that is taken for granted which is no law at all. His lordship further observed, that his own practice had not been, as the learned judges had stated, always to take a general verdict when there were bad counts, but only upon the good ones. After commenting upon the cases, he concluded:—I must consider the case of Rex v. Young (3 T. R. 91) as no authority in point, because all that is done in that case is not to arrest the judgment. My lords, I do not know how judgment was entered up in that case —I have no information at all on that point—I only know that the Court there refused to arrest the judgment, because there were some good counts in the indictment. As I have said, how they entered up judgment is quite unknown to me; therefore I must say, I consider that case is no authority at all in the present, and I think it has been owing to this fact having been overlooked that the case has been made the groundwork of so many cases since. My lords, both my learned friends have stated that this point never has been decided by the courts of law. My lords, if that be so, then it is difficult, I say, to make out an argument from a practice which has been carried on without a foundation of judicial decision. My lords, it has been observed that the party in such a case would not be able to defend himself in case of another prosecution on any other charge by pleading his acquittal on an indictment containing facts so defectively stated: if charged, and he pleads in answer to the charge, it will be said, "No, this is not the fact we mean, because it has not been stated on the record." What answer has been given to this by one of the most learned persons? My learned brother Coltman, a man of plain and manly mind, says that injustice would be done in that case; but what is the answer to that of my learned brother Patteson? He says the defendants, in that case, would be estopped from saying those counts are bad. Why, my lords, should they be estopped? This is all the answer that is given. Again, it is said, the difficulty of calling upon the judge, at the assizes, to decide upon the validity of the count is very great; yet you are called upon, my lords, to assume that he did so decide; indeed, two cases are put—according to one, it is a subject too difficult for him to decide at all, and yet, according to the other, you are to assume that he did decide this difficult question. I think, therefore, that the whole argument is founded on a mistaken and unfortunate observation of Lord Mansfield, which I think is altogether unsatisfactory. My lords, when your lordships see from this record that judgment has been pronounced on counts of an indictment some of which state no offence, and others state offences on which the findings have been erroneously entered up, your lordships, I think, will be of opinion that you cannot pass judgment in affirmance of the judgment of the court below. My lords, this point has overpowered me completely, not by its novelty alone, but its demonstrative force; and I am sensible that nothing but conviction amounting to absolute certainty will justify your lordships in pronouncing your judgment in this case. My lords, having great confidence in the learned judges of the Queen's Bench in Ireland, and in my learned brethren here, from whom I differ with the greatest possible respect; yet, acting here as a judge for myself, and being bound to act on reasons, I must say I think the reasons for this judgment are not good in point of law, and that therefore it is my duty to vote against the motion of my noble and learned friend.

Lords COTTENHAM and CAMPBELL agreed with Lord DENMAN, and the lay lords not voting, the judgment was thus reversed.

Equity Courts.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S COURT.

Monday, July 29.

OLDFIELD v. COBBETT.

Contempt—Injunction—Notice of motion to dissolve injunction.

The defendant, William Cobbett in person, moved to discharge an order, dated the 26th of July, 1842, by which he was restrained from proceeding in an action of debt against the plaintiff to recover a sum of 4,000*l.* which Cobbett alleged to be due from the plaintiff to the testator, William Cobbett, deceased, the defendant's father.

Wakefield objected that no notice of motion to dissolve the injunction had been given.

Motion refused with costs.

OLDFIELD v. COBBETT.

Pauper—Order to dispauper a party—Second rehearing.

The defendant then moved in person to discharge an order made by the Master of the Rolls, by which the defendant had been dispaupered.

Wakefield and Bacon.—This motion has been twice heard before the Master of the Rolls, and refused. The defendant must pay costs, to which he is liable, before the Court would entertain any application for a second rehearing.

The LORD CHANCELLOR (to the defendant).—I can hear you on the facts of the order.

Cobbett.—I cannot pay costs. The rehearing before the Master of the Rolls was stopped upon the formal ground that the petition of rehearing had not been signed by counsel.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—This is an application for a second rehearing, with the additional circumstance that the costs due from the defendant on former applications have not been paid. All the defendant has been stating is quite irrelevant. There has been already a second rehearing discharged with costs. Motion refused with costs.

OLDFIELD v. COBBETT.

A party in contempt can only apply to the Court for the purpose of discharging his contempt.

The defendant, in person, then moved, by way of appeal from Vice-Chancellor Knight Bruce, to discharge an order made by the Court of Exchequer on the 4th of February, 1840. The Vice-Chancellor refused to hear him, except for the purpose of discharging his contempt, and for that purpose only gave him permission to apply in formâ pauperis.

Wakefield and Bacon, contrà.

The LORD CHANCELLOR (having read the Vice-Chancellor's judgment).—The defendant cannot be heard except for the purpose of clearing his contempt. He cannot stir in the original motion until he has cleared his contempt by payment of the costs.

July 29 30.

OLDFIELD v. COBBETT.

Orders of courts of equity by the Mesne Process Abolition Act (1 & 2 Vict. c. 110) made equivalent to judgments for all purposes: but where one order directs payment of two distinct sums, such an order will be deemed one for payment of the aggregate of the two sums, and cannot be treated as an order to pay either sum separately.

The defendant, Wm. Cobbett, in person, again moved, upon the authority of the case of Tolson v. Dykes (1 Phillips, 439), that he might be discharged from custody for non-payment of a sum of 17*l.* 17*s.* 10*d.* costs he had been ordered to pay to the plaintiff, upon the ground that he had been in prison more than a year.

By the 48 Geo. 3, c. 123, a prisoner who has remained in prison for twelve calendar months, under a judgment obtained for a less sum than 20*l.* is entitled to his discharge; and the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 18, renders orders of the courts of equity for payment of costs equivalent to judgments. This has been decided by the Lord Chancellor in Tolson v. Dykes, wherein the plaintiff having been attached for non-payment of costs in equity, amounting to 14*l.* had been ordered to be discharged as to that attachment.

Gibson v. Curling, in the Court of Exchequer, 27th Nov. 1843, an unreported case, was also cited.

Wakefield and Bacon, contrà.—This defendant had been arrested under a commission of rebellion for non-payment of costs amounting to 31*l.*; thereupon he applied to be discharged, upon the ground of irregularity. That application failed, and the further sum of 17*l.* 10*s.* of tax costs was incurred by the defendant. The order directs payment of the two sums, and the aggregate being considerably more than 20*l.* the case of Tolson v. Dykes does not apply.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—The order is, that the defendant shall pay those two sums; if that aggregate sum had been less than 20*l.* he would have been entitled to be discharged; but being confined under an order for payment of costs amounting to more than 20*l.* there is no ground for the application. The defendant is regularly and properly committed.

OLDFIELD v. COBBETT.

Irregularity.

Where an irregularity has taken place in any of the proceedings of a Court of Equity, such irregularity will not form the ground of an action at law, but it is a matter the Court of Equity will itself set right.

The defendant in person also applied for his discharge in this suit, which was originally commenced in the Court of Exchequer, and, upon the abolition of the equity jurisdiction of that court, was transferred to the list of Vice-Chancellor Knight Bruce. The defendant had been attached in this suit for non-payment of costs, and committed to White Cross-street prison. The defendant then applied to the Court of Exchequer to be discharged, on the ground of irregularity; and the Chief Baron having heard the application, dismissed it with costs. Afterwards the defendant appealed to the Lord Chancellor, who also dismissed the appeal with costs. The defendant had also brought an action against Messrs. Johnson and Weatherall, the plaintiff's solicitors. The object of the defendant's present application seemed to be to obtain permission to proceed with that action.

Wakefield and Bacon, contrà.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—The defendant alleges that the solicitors acting for the plaintiff have been guilty of irregularity in the proceedings of this cause, and as part of that irregularity procured the defendant to be committed to prison, that the defendant says is the ground of action. But the Court of Exchequer investigated the complaint, and held that the proceedings complained of were not irregular. On an appeal to me, I refused to reverse the decision of the Court of Exchequer. Such irregularity, had it existed, could not have been the ground of an action, but is a matter for the Court itself to set right. The Court of Equity will never permit its proceedings to be questioned at law. The question here solely is, whether the action can be maintained against the plaintiff's solicitor, and I am clearly of opinion that it cannot.

Application refused with costs.

July 29 and 31.

OLDFIELD v. COBBETT.

Taking a bill pro confesso—Irregularity—13th rule of 1 Wm. 4, c. 36.

The second rule of that Act did not apply to the Court of Exchequer, and consequently a plaintiff was obliged to proceed under the old practice to take a bill in that court pro confesso.

The defendant again moved to be discharged, upon the ground that he is irregularly in custody, inasmuch as the plaintiff ought to have proceeded under 1 Wm. 4, c. 36, to take the bill pro confesso. The defendant was arrested upon an attachment for not putting in his answer on the 5th of June, 1840, and on the 11th of the same month was brought to the bar of the Court of Exchequer, and remanded back to the Fleet, but the second rule of 1 Wm. 4, c. 36, being held not applicable to the Court of Exchequer, the plaintiff could not obtain an immediate order to take the bill pro confesso, but was obliged to proceed under the old practice. On the 3rd of November, 1840, an alias habeas corpus was sued out, in order to take the bill pro confesso under the old practice, and the defendant was again brought to the bar of the Court of Exchequer on the 10th of November, and remanded. A pluries habeas corpus was then sued out. Before the return-day of that writ arrived, the defendant had put in his answer, when, of course, all process of default became nugatory.

The defendant contended that he was entitled to be discharged out of custody, under the 13th rule of the 1 Wm. 4, c. 36, because the plaintiff had not taken the bill pro confesso within six weeks after the expiration of two calendar months after he was lodged in prison.

Wakefield and Bacon, contrà.—The second rule did not apply to the Court of Exchequer, and the plaintiff was compelled to proceed under the old practice. The defendant was never in custody under the [illegible] rule, but having put in his answer before the plaintiff could take the bill pro confesso under the old practice, he remained in custody for contempt, [illegible] of costs. Besides, if any irregularity had occurred, the defendant had waived it by putting in his answer. (Const v. Barr, 2 Russell, 161.) The defendant's complaint is, that he was in custody from June to November.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—Should he not have been brought up sooner?

Wakefield.—The Exchequer was not a court constantly open. The judges were on the circuit. But even if the proceeding was irregular, it has been cured by the defendant's answer.

Bacon.—The 13th order requires the bill to be taken pro confesso within six weeks after the expiration of two months from the time the defendant is lodged in prison. The plaintiff was obliged to proceed either under the old practice or the new. The rules from 5 to 20 only applied to the Court of Exchequer; but as the second rule did not apply to that court, and as the time had not elapsed under the old practice, it was not in the plaintiff's power to take the bill pro confesso. On that ground the Chief Baron had refused two applications by the defendant similar to the present.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—The point respecting the alleged irregularity has been decided against Mr. Cobbett, in the Court of Exchequer, and also by myself; and I see no reason to alter the opinion I have already expressed. The motion must, therefore, be Refused with costs.

July 29 and 30.

OLDFIELD v. COBBETT.

Stay of proceedings.

Vexatious litigation by a pauper defendant, who remains in prison for contempt in non-payment of costs, will be restrained by an order staying all proceedings on his part until he has cleared his contempt.

Wakefield and Bacon moved "that no petition by or in the name or on the behalf of the defendant, William Cobbett, in the above cause be received or answered, and that no notice of motion by or on the behalf of the said defendant be made in the above cause until the said defendant shall have paid the costs ordered to be paid by him by an order made in this cause bearing date the 15th day of December, 1840, and which have been taxed at the sums of 17*l.* 17s. 10d. and 31s. 6s. 6d. and until he shall have cleared his contempts in this cause by reason of which he is now detained in the Queen's Prison, and until he shall have paid the costs of the several motions made in this cause, which have been refused, and the costs thereof directed to be paid by the said defendant, William Cobbett, or that his lordship will make such further or other order as shall seem meet, and that the costs of the present application might be paid by the said William Cobbett." They stated in detail the various applications made by the defendant, all of which had been refused, with costs. (Pickett v. Loggon, 5 Vesey, 702; Wilson v. Bates, 3 Mylne & Craig, 197.)

July 30.—The LORD CHANCELLOR.—I do not see how I can make such an order as is asked for by the plaintiff's motion, but I will prevent the defendant from applying for a rehearing upon a point which has already been twice adjudicated upon. I should like to have a list of the various applications. I shall also prevent him from taking any steps in the cause without payment of the costs. From the experience I have had of the defendant's proceedings, I shall order that the plaintiff be directed to pay no attention to any notices of motion which Mr. Cobbett might give, unless specially directed by me to do so.

VICE-CHANCELLOR OF ENGLAND'S COURT.

Tuesday, July 16.

MARTIN v. MAUGHAM and OTHERS.

Will—Uncertainty—Remoteness—Direction for accumulation—Bequest for charities—Cy Pres.

Clause of forfeiture in case of assignment of an interest under the will—Assignment by insolvent legatee.

When the charitable objects of a testator's bounty are clearly pointed out, but the manner in which he directs those objects to take cannot be carried into effect, the Court will not allow the general intention of the testator to be entirely frustrated, but will, if necessary, under the cy pres doctrine, sacrifice his particular for the sake of upholding his general intention, and will endeavour, as far as possible, to give effect to the latter by directing the Master to settle a scheme.

Where the testator has inserted a clause of forfeiture in case of assignment, and one of the annuitants under the will petitioned the Court for the relief of insolvent debtors, offering to vest the whole of his property in the provisional assignee, including in his schedule annexed to his petition the annuity in question,—whether that might be considered so far a voluntary assignment as to bring the annuity within the intended prohibition and consequent forfeiture—Quære.

Samuel Butler, the testator, being possessed of considerable personal property, by his will, bearing date the 13th of May, 1821, having directed that all his property not consisting of money should be converted into cash, and after the payment of his debts, be invested by the executors in the testator's name in the 3 per cent. Consols, and the annual interest thereof to be disposed of in the first place to certain annuitants therein named, with a direction that as they might drop off, their respective annuities should be added to his estate to accumulate for the express purpose thereafter specified, goes on as follows:—"I now come to the plan of my great desire, which is to establish a sinking fund, to begin with a net income of 600*l.* per annum, and in case I should not have so much at my death, my will and desire is, whatever sum I may leave at my decease in the care of my trust (trustees) that every half-year's dividend may be added to the amount of principal till it arrives at the net income of 600*l.* per annum, and with that sum to begin my proposed sinking establishment. I should then hope that every five years' receipt of income so managed would produce an increase of income, say, 150*l.* per annum, and my will and desire is that every such increase of income, say 150*l.* per annum, be appropriated in the care of my trust, as I shall hereafter specify, for the benefit of the parish charity schools in this country in the following order." The testator then specifies ten different charity schools in and about London, which he directed should take the benefit of his bounty; and also directs the manner in which he intended they should be regulated in reference to their internal discipline, and the prizes to be awarded to the boys, and the apprenticing them out to tradesmen. The testator having appointed his executors, requested them, when they should have duly and faithfully executed his will according to his instructions, to assign over all his property, both real and personal, belonging to him at his death, to the Vintners' Company, to the end that the same might be applied by them to the several charitable purposes thereinbefore directed.

The testator made his first codicil to his will bearing date the 13th day of May, 1824, wherein having expressed that the great object and tendency of his will being to serve the poor charity boys of his country, he was induced by his codicil to appoint to his already chosen respectable trust (trustees) Lord Giffard, Master of the Rolls, and, in case of his death before him, the testator, the Master of the Rolls for the time being to continue in trust with the Vintners' Company for ever.

By his second codicil, dated 13th of May, 1829, the testator appointed the plaintiff, C. Martin the younger, in the place of his father. And by his third codicil, bearing date the 13th day of May, 1834, substituted other legatees and annuitants in the room of some who had died in the meantime. His fourth codicil bore date the 13th of May, 1836.

The testator executed a fifth codicil, whereby he directed that in case any of his annuitants should attempt to sell or dispose of their interest in his annuities, which he wished to be for their peculiar benefit, from that moment his legacy to them was to terminate for ever, and the principal and interest were to revert to the general fund as specified in his said will.

The testator died on the 15th of May, 1837, and the present suit was instituted for the purpose of carrying out the trusts of the will under the direction of the Court. It appeared by the Master's reports, that the testator's property amounted to about 8,000*l.* and the various annuities charged by his will and codicils upon that fund amounted to 200*l.*

William Thacker, one of the plaintiffs, and an annuitant, presented his petition to the Court for the relief of insolvent debtors, stating that the whole of his real and personal estate should be vested in the provisional assignee, and in his schedule he had included the before-mentioned annuity of 60*l.*

The cause came on for further directions.

Cooper and Lloyd, for the next of kin, contended, that the will was void for uncertainty, and as being contrary to the policy of the law in respect to the direction for accumulation; that, according to the Master's report, the amount of the testator's property out of which his magnificent donations were to arise, consisted of 8,800*l.* stock, out of which he gives 200*l.* per annum for annuities, so that when he comes to "the plan of his great desire," the amount of the fund for the intended purpose is only 69*l.* a year; but before he starts at all he begins his charities with 600*l.* per annum, thus the present residue must go on accumulating till it amounts to about 20,000*l.* stock; thus, it would take nearly thirty years to accomplish the required amount, which would bring it within the mischief pointed out by the Thelluson Act, 39 & 40 Geo. 3, c. 98. (Webb v. Webb, 2 Bea. 493; Attorney-General v. Fitzherbert, V.C. Wigram's Court; Curtis v. Lukin, 5 Bea. 147.) As to the forfeiture of the annuity, the legatee having done a voluntary act, such as presenting his petition to the Insolvent Debtors' Court, this act not being in invitum or compulsory, shall amount to a forfeiture. Brandon v. Aston (2 Yo. & Coll. 24); and a more recent one, Pym v. Lockyer (12 Sim. 394).

Romilly and Daniel, for the Master of the Rolls, said that his lordship was perfectly willing to exercise the charity if decreed to do so, and that the testator, having given his property for charitable purposes, the Court will direct a scheme either for the particular charity, or by the cy pres doctrine; that the Courts are more liberal as to limitations for charities than as between individuals. There are two questions: the first is as to the general charity; the second, as to the particular charity. (Attorney-General v. Bishop of Chester, 1 Bro. C. C. 444; Attorney-General v. Ironmongers' Company, 1 Car. & Pa. 208; 1 Farm. on Wills, pp. 216, 217; Moggridge v. Thackwell, 7 Ves. 36, 13 Ves. 416.)

Jarvis, for the Vintners' Company.

Stuart and Heathfield submitted, on behalf of the insolvent annuitant, that the circumstance of his having voluntarily petitioned under the Insolvent Debtors Act his willingness to assign, could not of itself be called an assignment, and therefore did not bring him within the scope of the testator's clause of forfeiture; that the vesting order availed to pass the annuitant's own property and effects, and not another's, i. e. that of the testator.(a)

Spence, for Maugham, an executor and trustee.

Wray, on behalf of the Attorney-General.—We admit that in the case of remoteness, where there is a limitation after a remote period, such limitation is void; but where a testator, as in the present case, assumes to give an amount to a greater extent than what his property will of itself warrant at the time of his death, the Court will not bring it within the class of cases which deal of remoteness. But, supposing the testator intended an accumulation of his property till it amounted to the required sum, he may have been deceived in his expectations, and have anticipated other property sufficient to answer the purposes intended. Remoteness must be shewn upon the face of the will, and, however absurd the intentions may be, the Court will not refuse to carry out those intentions as far as it can, notwithstanding the amount may not have been what was contemplated, neither will it entirely frustrate the testator's views, although he may in his bequests have far exceeded the amount of his property.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—The general impression upon my mind is, that although the particular mode which the testator has pointed out cannot take effect literally, nor the disposition of his property in behalf of the schools to take in succession be carried out according to his own views, yet there is virtually a clear intention to benefit the schools, which precludes the next of kin from taking any share of the property. Now where there is a general intention declared for objects of a charity, the particular mode in which the benefit is directed to take effect amounts to nothing, that is, in relation to the question whether the devotion for charitable purposes shall take effect or not; but the main question will be this, viz. whether it cannot be carried out by means of some other scheme. The testator evidently intended the charity boys to receive the benefit of his bequests. They cannot do so in the way indicated by him; therefore the Court will endeavour to effectuate the general intention as far as it can.

Declare that the bequest in favour of the charity is a good and valid bequest. Refer to the Master to settle a scheme. Dismiss the bill as against the assignee and the insolvent annuitant, also the next of kin, who are to have their costs as between solicitor and client.(b)

Opposition to insolvent by attorney—Production of retainer—Amending schedule.

This was the first hearing of an insolvent whose petition was filed since the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96.

Homes appeared in support of the insolvent, who was opposed by Wheler, attorney of Stratford.

On Wheler offering to examine the insolvent,

Homes objected that some retainer or authority in writing should be produced, before an attorney, attending unaccompanied by his client, could be heard in opposition. A letter of attorney was required in

(a) The plaintiff Thacker afterwards abandoned his claim to the annuity, and Mr. Wray, for the Attorney-General, making no objection, he was allowed his costs as between solicitor and client.

(b) This was by an arrangement of the parties; for when Mr. Cooper first asked for the costs as between solicitor and client, the Vice-Chancellor declined, unless with the consent of others interested in the question, such not being the custom of the court. In the discussion which took place relative to the question of costs, the following cases were referred to: Moggridge v. Thackwell, already cited; Attorney-General v. Haberdashers' Company and Tonna (4 Bro. C. C. 178). Finally, Mr. Wray, for the Attorney-General, not objecting, the costs were so allowed.

the choice of assignees, and an opposition to the petition was certainly as important a matter as the choice. It was necessary that the objection should be made on the hearing of the first petition, as the future practice would probably be regulated by the decision.

His Honour.—The old practice was to take the word of the attorney that he was retained by the opposing creditor, and I shall not refuse to permit Mr. Wheler to examine the insolvent, however desirable it may appear that an attorney, on presenting himself to oppose an insolvent, should produce some memorandum or written retainer from the parties for whom he appears.

Wheler then examined the insolvent at considerable length, and succeeded in eliciting that some trifling sales of property by the insolvent shortly before his petition were omitted in his schedule.

Homes contended that they were included in a gross sum accounted for: at all events they were not wilfully omitted, and may now be inserted in the schedule. (7 & 8 Vict. c. 96, s. 3.)

His Honour said that it was quite clear that the omission was not wilful, and allowed the amendment to be made forthwith.

A day was then named for the final order.

BRISTOL SUMMER ASSIZES.

(Before Mr. Justice Patteson.)

Kynaston and Another, Assignees, v. Crouch.

Liability of clerk who receives money in the way of business after the bankruptcy of his employer to refund it to the assignees, notwithstanding he has paid it away in the course of business.

Quære—Is ignorance of the act of bankruptcy a defence?

Cockburn and Smith appeared for the plaintiffs.

Crowder and Butt for the defendant.

Cockburn stated that this was an action brought by the plaintiffs, Mr. Roger Kynaston, official assignee, and Mr. Samuel Hudd, creditors' assignee, in the matter of John Wolland Bake, a bankrupt, against Edward Crouch, for the recovery of 153*l.* odd, received by him on behalf of the assignees. Bake carried on business as a leather-seller, for two or three years, in Christmas-street, Bristol; and on the 27th of October, 1843, he suddenly (having been in circumstances of great embarrassment, and carrying on business by means of fictitious bills) left Bristol and went to Liverpool, whence he sailed immediately for New York. This was an act of bankruptcy, and it evidently appeared that he left Bristol without any intention of returning. The defendant, Mr. Crouch, who had been Bake's confidential clerk and traveller, remained in the shop carrying on the business. Early in November Mr. Hudd, the assignee, and another creditor, called at the shop, and saw Crouch, the defendant, who told them that Bake had left Bristol, and he had received a letter from him, but refused to produce that letter. Crouch then admitted that he had received money in the shop, and said he was ready to give an account of it when the proper time came. Bake was then adjudicated a bankrupt, and Mr. Morgan was appointed official assignee, but he had by the order of the Lord Chancellor been removed to Manchester, and Mr. Kynaston had been appointed in his place. Crouch, in his examination before the Bankruptcy Court, admitted that he had received money on behalf of Bake to the amount of 153*l.* odd, and he (the counsel) should produce the proceedings in the Bankruptcy Court to prove the receipt of this money. To the claim of the assignees the defendant pleaded that he had a set-off for work and labour done and money paid, but the assignees entirely repudiated any such service alleged to be rendered by Crouch. He should shew that Mr. Crouch was cognizant of a series of fraudulent transactions, by means of which Bake was enabled to defraud his creditors. It seemed that, in the desperate circumstances into which Bake had been brought, he had adopted a regular system of fraud, drawing bills and forging the acceptances of parties who never accepted the bills, and who owed him nothing. The defendant, Crouch, according to his own statement, lent himself to these transactions, he being the man who drew the bills, at the same time knowing that the parties owed Bake nothing. The jury would have, he thought, no hesitation in believing that the bankrupt's absence was with the knowledge of Crouch. The defendant carried on the business in Christmas-street, till he transferred himself to some premises almost adjoining, in Host-street, having got possession of the bankrupt's stock, which he contended was bought by his (defendant's) brother for him, the proceeds of which he (defendant) also alleged he had paid on behalf of the bankrupt. The assignees knew nothing of such payments, and contended that if such payments were made, they were made to defraud the creditors.

Mr. Edward Inskipp, Usher in the Bankruptcy Court, produced the file of proceedings in Bake's bankruptcy.

F. N. Watkins, sheriff's officer, deposed that he was employed to serve writs upon the bankrupt. He saw Crouch at the bankrupt's premises on the 9th November, who told him it was useless to come there to attempt to make a seizure of Mr. Bake, for he was far enough away, and would not again return to Bristol. He afterwards levied an attachment out of the Tolzey Court upon the goods on the premises of bankrupt; Mr. Crouch then said that he had given information to some creditors, but he was not aware that such a summary proceeding as an attachment could take place, or he would not have given the information.

Cross-examined: Witness asked what money he had on the premises? Crouch replied, all that he had received he had expended on the business of the shop.

Mr. Brooke Smith (plaintiff's solicitor) deposed that he accompanied the plaintiff Hudd and another creditor to Mr. Bake's shop on the 10th Nov.; he saw Crouch, the defendant, there, who told him that Bake left Bristol for London on 27th Oct. for the purpose of paying some bills; but he (Crouch) said he knew that the bills had not then been paid. Crouch said he had heard from Bake, but refused to produce the letter or to tell the contents of it. Crouch also said that he knew Bake would not return, as there were bills out of his, which would prevent him from returning. Crouch said he was carrying on the business of the shop, and that he kept an account, which he should be ready to produce to any person who had authority to demand it, but refused to give any further explanation to the party with whom he (witness) was acting. Crouch further stated that Bake, the day before he left Bristol, had received 200*l.* from Mr. N. Moore. Mr. Smith then read the examinations of Crouch, taken upon the 5th Dec. and the 14th Feb. in which Crouch admitted having received 153*l.* on behalf of the bankrupt after his departure from Bristol: also that he had been a party to certain accommodation bills of the bankrupt. In Crouch's examination of the 12th of March, he alluded to a book in which was detailed the way the sum of 153*l.* received by him had been expended.

Crowder then addressed the jury for the defendant. He said that for the case to have been fairly put by the plaintiffs, they should have produced the book in which was stated the manner the sum received by the defendant had been disbursed. He (defendant) received the money as the agent of his master, Bake, and paid it as such agent. He contended that there was no pretence for saying that the defendant was aware that an act of bankruptcy had been committed at the time when he received and expended the money. After some further remarks, the learned counsel submitted to the jury, first, that the defendant had no knowledge of the act of bankruptcy; and, secondly, that it was an action which could not be maintained by the assignees, whether his client was aware of any act of bankruptcy or not, by Bake. He then read the different items from the book above alluded to, of the expenditure of the 153*l.* which had been paid (according as it appeared in the book) part as wages to journeymen, and to the defendant, and in the discharge of various bills, &c. The learned counsel then remarked upon the injustice of calling upon a person to refund money which he had expended as the agent of another person, and said if such were to be the case no party in a similar situation as servant would be safe, and instanced the case of a clerk or other servant in a large concern receiving 1,000*l.* to pay out in wages to the men from the proprietor of the works, who, prior to the time of the money being paid should commit an act of bankruptcy, which would render the person paying the 1,000*l.* liable to be sued for the amount by the assignees who might subsequently be appointed.

The learned Judge summed up. His lordship said, very considerable difficulty presented itself in this case, as it was not an ordinary case arising out of the relationship of master and servant. There could be no doubt that Bake committed an act of bankruptcy on the 29th of October, and it seemed to be pretty clear that he dared not return, inasmuch as he had committed extensive forgeries, by forging the acceptances of parties to accommodation bills. If, however, Bake had returned, he could not help thinking that the defendant would have been answerable for all the money he had received. The defendant pleaded that he had a set-off against the assignees. It was quite clear that the plea could not be supported, for if the money was received on behalf of the assignees, then he must shew that the sums said to have been paid were paid with the authority of the assignees; and there had been no attempt to shew that any such authority had been given. As soon as the bankruptcy occurred, all moneys received after that time were received as for the use of the assignees; and inasmuch as the servant receiving the money received no authority to expend it, no set-off could be allowed as against the assignees, and all money paid under such circumstances would be to the loss of the person paying it. He agreed with the learned counsel that this was a very hard case, but it was, he believed, the state of the law. The point required considerably more care and attention than he could give to it at Nisi Prius, and he should direct that a verdict be given for the plaintiffs, with leave to enter a nonsuit. But it would make a very considerable difference in any future consideration to have the judgment of the jury as to whether the defendant knew of the act of bankruptcy having been committed. His lordship then proceeded to remark upon the contents of the book containing the items of the receipt and expenditure of 153*l.* by the defendant since the bankrupt left; and observed that it was a very singular fact that the two sides of the account should come to precisely the same amount—the column of expenses being made up by an item of 1*l.* 9*s.* 10½*d.* as cash to himself (the defendant). He also remarked severely upon the manner in which the defendant had been a party to the accommodation bills. Under these circumstances the jury would return a verdict for the plaintiff for 153*l.* 13*s.* with leave to enter a nonsuit, and the question for them to consider was whether the defendant, at the time he made the payments, knew that an act of bankruptcy had been committed. His lordship in conclusion said that the defendant had made several payments upon the 10th and 11th of November, and had acknowledged on the 9th that he was aware of an act of bankruptcy having been committed.

The jury returned that they were of opinion that the defendant knew on the 9th of November of an act of bankruptcy having been committed.

Verdict for the plaintiff, damages 153l. 13s., with leave to move for a nonsuit, or the Court to reduce the amount of damages.

[Note.—For the report of this case we are indebted to the Bristol Gazette, but we have reason to know that it is very accurate. It will, of course, form the subject of discussion in Banc. and if it should be upheld to the full extent, protection must be afforded by statute to persons under such circumstances. In the principal case, the knowledge on the part of the clerk, and his conduct, makes the case "less hard," but it would not always, or even generally, be so.—Ed. Law T.]

HOUSE OF LORDS.

COMMISSIONERS OF BANKRUPTCY.

Thursday, Sept. 5.—Lord Brougham, in the course of the morning, moved for a return of the number of days the commissioners of bankruptcy had sat for the last three months, distinguishing the several months. In moving for this return the noble lord stated that he hoped his noble and learned friend on the woolsack would take an early opportunity of removing one of the greatest grievances which the suitors of the City of London were subject to—namely, the commissioners of bankruptcy only sitting for two or three days at most in a week, crowding twenty-seven or thirty things into one morning's sitting.—The Lord Chancellor said he had no authority over them.—Lord Brougham.—O yes you have, by the last Act.—The Lord Chancellor said that as to the commissioners of bankruptcy, they had enough now before them in deciding questions on his noble friend's bill.—Lord Brougham said the commissioners chose to crowd twenty-seven or thirty cases into one morning's business, in order to get away to their villas in the neighbourhood of London; and as to his Bill, they put the most wrong and erroneous constructions upon it.—The Lord Chancellor declared the Parliament to stand prorogued until Thursday, the 10th Oct. next.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, Sept. 5.—The Speaker took the chair at half-past twelve o'clock. The number of members who were present was considerably more than usually attend on the last day of a session. Mr. Benbow, the new member for Dudley, took the oaths and his seat. The House adjourned (after having read in the House of Lords the Commission for Prorogation) till Thursday, Oct. 10.

2. Provided always, and be it enacted, That this Act shall not extend to the contract of composition of any person who shall be desirous of determining the same on the fifth day of April, One thousand eight hundred and forty-five, and who shall on or before the 10th day of October, One thousand eight hundred and forty-four, give notice thereof in writing to the assessor or collector of the parish or place, or to the surveyor acting in the execution of the Acts relating to the duties of assessed taxes for the district in which such composition shall be payable.

3. Commissioners of Stamps and Taxes empowered to direct within what districts and parishes privileged and other places shall be rated to the assessed taxes and property tax.—And whereas difficulties have arisen in carrying into execution the several Acts relating to the duties of assessed taxes, and the duties on profits arising from property, professions, trades, and offices, in divers privileged and other places, by reason of doubts as to whether such places are extra-parochial, or included within or forming part of any parish, tithing, or place for which separate assessments of the said duties have been usually heretofore made; for remedy whereof be it enacted, that it shall be lawful for the Commissioners of Stamps and Taxes, or any two or more of them, and they are hereby authorized and empowered, from time to time, by any order in writing under their hands, to order and direct that any privileged or other place, whether extra parochial or not, but not being itself an entire parish, shall, for the purposes of assessing, charging, collecting, and levying the said duties respectively, and for all other the purposes of the several Acts aforesaid, be deemed to be within or part of such district or division, and within or part of such parish, tithing, ward, or place respectively, as shall appear to the said commissioners to be most convenient and proper for the purposes aforesaid, and thereupon such privileged or other place shall be deemed to be within or part of such district or division, and within or part of such parish, tithing, ward, or place, according to such order, for all the purposes aforesaid; and the said respective duties shall be assessed, charged, raised, collected, and levied within such privileged or other place, and upon the occupiers or inhabitants thereof, by or under the authority of the commissioners appointed or authorized to put in execution the said respective Acts in the district or division, and by the assessors, collectors, or other officers appointed for the parish, tithing, ward, or place within or part of which such privileged or other place shall be by any such order as aforesaid declared or directed to be deemed to be, any law, statute, or usage to the contrary notwithstanding: provided always, that it shall be lawful for the said commissioner of stamps and taxes, or any two of them, to revoke any such order, and to substitute any other order in lieu thereof, from time to time as often as it shall appear to the said commissioners to be expedient so to do: provided also, that no such order shall prejudice or affect any assessment of the said respective duties for any year prior to that in which such order shall be made; but that all such duties assessed and charged for any previous year shall be collected, levied, and recovered by the same persons under the same authority, and in like manner as they would have been if such order had not been made.

4. Mode of proceeding to make the assessments of the duties in the year in which any order was made for annexing any privileged or other place to a parish for the purposes of the said Acts.—And be it enacted, That where before or at the time of the making of any such order as aforesaid any assessment of the respective duties or either of them shall have been made for such privileged or other place as aforesaid, or upon the occupiers or inhabitants thereof, in or for the year in which such order shall be made, whether the same shall be a separate assessment for such privileged or other place, or part of or included in the assessment for any parish, tithing, ward, or other place, in case the duties so assessed shall not have been previously paid and discharged, the surveyor of the said duties shall certify the particulars of every such assessment to the commissioners acting in the execution of the said Acts respectively for the district, and parish, tithing, ward or place, within or part of which such privileged or other place shall be by such order declared or deemed to be; and where at the time of the making of any such order as aforesaid no assessment of the said respective duties shall have been made for such privileged or other place as aforesaid, or upon the occupiers or inhabitants thereof, in or for the said year, or in case there shall be any omission of any person, article, matter, or thing in or from any such assessment as last aforesaid which shall have been made, or any insufficient rate or amount of duty charged thereby, it shall be lawful for the surveyor of the said duties to certify in like manner to the said commissioners the particulars of any assessment which ought to be made upon any occupier or inhabitant of such privileged or other place, and of any increased rate or amount of duty which ought to be charged upon any such occupier or inhabitant; and in any of the several cases aforesaid the said commissioners shall cause the particulars so certified to them as aforesaid to be inserted or included in or added to the assessment of the like duties made or to be made for the same year in or for the parish, tithing, ward, or place within or part of which such privileged or other place shall be by such order as aforesaid declared or deemed to be, and shall cause the duties to be assessed and charged thereon or in respect thereof according to such certificate, and thereupon the said duties shall be deemed to be part of the lastmentioned assessment for all intents and purposes whatsoever, and shall be collected, received, levied, accounted for, and paid over by the collectors or other persons appointed or to be appointed or authorized to collect, receive, or levy the duties contained in the said assessment, without any further or other warrant or order in that behalf; provided always, that every such assessment or charge of duties made in pursuance of such certificate of the surveyor as aforesaid shall be subject to an appeal by the party charged with or liable to the payment of the said duties, upon his giving notice in writing to such surveyor of his intention to appeal against such assessment or charge within ten days after the particulars thereof shall have been notified to such party; and every such appeal shall be heard and determined by the said respective commissioners within their district at such time and place as they shall appoint for that purpose, of which due notice shall be given to the party assessed or charged as aforesaid.

5. Execution of the powers of the Acts by the commissioners declared valid, although not within the times prescribed for that purpose.—And whereas by the said Acts relating to the said respective duties the commissioners for putting the same in execution respectively are required or directed to hold certain meetings, and to appoint certain officers, and also to do and perform divers other acts, matters, and things, in the execution of the powers and provisions of the said Acts, before or upon certain days or times appointed and prescribed by the said Acts for such purposes respectively: And whereas, in cases where the said commissioners have omitted to put in execution the powers and provisions of the said Acts within or at the times so appointed and prescribed as aforesaid, doubts have arisen as to the legality of their execution of such powers and provisions at any subsequent period, and it is expedient to remove such doubts; be it therefore enacted, That where in any case the said respective commissioners have neglected or omitted, or shall hereafter neglect or omit, to hold any meeting, or to appoint any officer, or to do or perform any other act, matter, or thing, in the execution of the powers and provisions of the said Acts respectively, within or at the time directed, appointed, or prescribed by the said Acts in that behalf, the holding of such meeting, and the appointment of such officer, and the performance of any such other act, matter, or thing as aforesaid at any other time or times shall, notwithstanding any such neglect or omission, be and be deemed to have been respectively as good, valid, and effectual to all intents and purposes as if the same respectively had been held, made, done, or performed within or at the time and according to the manner and circumstances directed, appointed, or prescribed as aforesaid, any thing in the said Acts contained to the contrary thereof notwithstanding.

6. Penalty on persons refusing to appear before the commissioners to be appointed assessors, or submit to be appointed, 10*l*.—And whereas by the said Acts relating to the said duties respectively the commissioners acting in the execution thereof are required to direct their precepts to such inhabitants of each parish, ward, or place, and such number of them, as they shall think most convenient, to be presenters and assessors for such parish, ward, or place, requiring them to appear before the said commissioners at such place and at such time as they shall appoint, in order that such of the said inhabitants as the said commissioners shall think proper may be appointed assessors of the said several duties: and whereas it frequently happens that the persons to whom such precepts are directed wilfully disobey the same, whereby the execution of the said Acts is greatly impeded: be it therefore enacted, That if any person to whom any such precept as aforesaid shall be directed shall wilfully neglect or refuse to appear before the said respective commissioners according to the tenor and effect thereof, or, having appeared, shall refuse to submit to be appointed an assessor of the said duties or of either of them respectively, in the manner and form by the statute in such case directed and provided, every person so offending in any such case as aforesaid shall forfeit and pay for every such offence the sum of ten pounds, to be recovered and applied in like manner as any penalty incurred under the said Acts or any of them may be recovered and applied.

7. Recital of 49 Geo. 3, c. 32 and c. 110, granting duties of 1*s.* and 6*d. on offices and employments. Commissioners of the Treasury empowered to appoint commissioners for executing the recited Acts, with relation to the said duties.*—And whereas by an Act passed in the forty-ninth year of the reign of King George the Third, intituled "An Act for continuing and making perpetual several Duties of One Shilling and Sixpence, repealed by an Act of the last Session of Parliament, on Offices and Employments of Profit, and on Annuities, Pensions, and Stipends, and thereby granted for One Year to the Twenty-fifth Day of March, One thousand eight hundred and nine," certain rates and duties of one shilling and sixpence respectively specified and contained in the schedule to the said Act annexed were granted and made payable: and whereas another Act was passed in the same session of Parliament, to rectify a mistake in the last-recited Act: and whereas it is expedient to make provision for the appointment of commissioners to execute the said last-recited Acts in certain cases: be it therefore enacted, That where in any case there is or shall be any failure in the appointment of commissioners for executing the said recited Acts, whether the same shall proceed from the want of legal authority in any person or persons to make such appointment, or from the neglect or omission of any person or persons having such authority to appoint such commissioners, or from any other cause, it shall be lawful for the Commissioners of her Majesty's Treasury, or any three or more of them, from time to time, by writing under their hands, to appoint commissioners for putting in execution the said recited Acts passed in the forty-ninth year of the reign of King George the Third, and the powers therein referred to or contained in relation to the said respective rates and duties of one shilling and sixpence, in the several departments or districts throughout Great Britain; and such commissioners so to be appointed as last aforesaid are hereby empowered and required to do all things necessary for putting the said recited Acts in execution with relation to the said rates and duties, in the like and in as full and ample a manner as any commissioners appointed or authorized by or under the authority of any former Act or Acts could or might at any time heretofore put in execution the said recited Acts.

8. Act may be altered this session.—And be it enacted that this Act may be amended or repealed by any Act to be passed in the present session of Parliament.

5 & 6 Vict. c. 53. Agreements contemplated by the recited Act may be contingent on grant of sessions of the peace.—Whereas an Act was passed in the sixth year of the reign of her Majesty, intituled "An Act to encourage the Establishment of District Courts and Prisons," and it is expedient that the said Act be amended, for the purpose of removing doubts as to the manner of putting the said Act in force with respect to those boroughs to which a separate court of sessions of the peace has not been granted at the time of making the agreements contemplated by the said Act: be it declared and enacted by the Queen's most excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, that it shall be lawful for the council of any borough to which her Majesty shall not have then granted a separate court of sessions of the peace to be party to any agreement for the purposes of the said Act; and it shall be also lawful to insert in any such agreement, if the parties thereunto shall think fit, a condition that such agreement shall not take effect unless her Majesty shall be pleased to grant a separate court of sessions of the peace to any such borough; and in case such condition shall be therein inserted, no agreement shall be valid, notwithstanding that the same shall have been approved by the several parties thereto, and confirmed by her Majesty, as directed by the said Act, until her Majesty shall have been pleased to grant such separate court of sessions of the peace to the borough or boroughs respecting which the said condition shall have been inserted in the agreement.

2. Repeal of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 53, s. 41, as to divisions of united districts.—And be it enacted, That so much of the said Act as provides that in every case in which more than one borough having a court of sessions of the peace shall be a party to the agreement aforesaid the district united under such agreement shall be divided into as many divisions as there shall be boroughs included in such agreement, and to each of such boroughs shall be apportioned such a division of the said district as shall be more immediately adjacent thereunto, and shall be set forth in the agreement, regard being had to the amount of population in the whole district, and the other circumstances of the case, and all prisoners committed to the said prison for any offence committed within any division aforesaid shall be sent for trial to the sessions of the peace holden for that borough to which such division shall have been apportioned, and the provisions hereinbefore contained with respect to jurors, and the return of convictions, depositions, recognizances, and other documents, for the united district, shall apply in each case to the division apportioned to each borough, shall be repealed.

3. Provisions as to divisions of any united district, whether grant made before or after confirmation of agreement.—And be it enacted, That in every case in which more than one borough having a court of sessions of the peace shall be a party to any such agreement, whether or not the grant of such court shall have been made before or after the confirmation of the agreement, the united district shall be divided into as many divisions as there are boroughs to which such grants shall have been made, in such manner as shall be absolutely or provisionally set forth in the agreement, or as shall be provided by any supplemental agreement to be made and enforced in like manner as the original agreement, so, nevertheless, that one such borough shall be included in and form the whole or part of every such division; and the united district, and also each of such divisions, shall be designated by such names as shall be set forth in such agreement or supplemental agreement; and a court of sessions of the peace for each division of the united district shall be holden in the borough which forms the whole or part of such division, before the recorder thereof, who shall be the recorder of that division and sole judge of the court which shall have the like jurisdiction throughout the division which the court of sessions of the peace for any of the said boroughs has within such borough; and the provisions in the said Act contained with respect to the clerk of the peace, and to jurors, and the return of convictions, depositions, recognizances, and other documents, for the united district, shall apply in each case separately to each division, and to the borough which is included in and forms the whole or part of such division.

4. Secretary of State to appoint Surveyor-General of Prisons.—And whereas by an Act passed in the third year of the reign of her Majesty, intituled "An Act for the better ordering of Prisons," it is provided, that it shall not be lawful to enlarge, build, or rebuild any prison until one of her Majesty's principal Secretaries of State shall have approved the plan of such prison or intended prison; be it enacted, that it shall be lawful for the Secretary of State to appoint a proper person to be Surveyor-General of Prisons for the purpose of advising the justices and others having the superintendence of the construction of prisons, and for reporting to the Secretary of State on the several plans which shall be sent to him for his approval as aforesaid, and for the performance of such other duties connected with the construction of prisons as shall be from time to time intrusted to him by the Secretary of State.

4. Exempting such parts of parishes as lie within boroughs exempted by 5 & 6 Vict. c. 109.—And whereas by the said Act it is provided, that nothing therein contained shall apply to certain boroughs and places therein specified: and whereas doubts have been entertained as to the powers of the justices to appoint constables for any parish of which part shall be within and part without such exempted borough or place; be it declared or enacted, that with respect to any such parish the exemptions provided by the said Act shall be deemed only to exempt the men residing within that part of the parish which is within such exempted borough or place from serving as constables under the said Act, or being included in any list to be made out under the said Act, and to disqualify the inhabitants of such part from voting in any division of the vestry under the said Act.

We give this statute entire.

4 & 5 Vict. c. 35. Provisions of former Acts as to recovery of expenses, costs, &c. to extend to cases where there shall not be an apportionment.—Whereas an Act was passed in the session of Parliament holden in the fourth and fifth years of the reign of her present Majesty Queen Victoria, intituled "An Act for the Commutation of certain Manorial Rights in respect of Lands of Copyhold and Customary Tenure, and in respect of other Lands subject to such Rights; and for facilitating the Enfranchisement of such Lands, and for the Improvement of such Tenure," and was amended and explained by an Act passed in the session of Parliament holden in the sixth and seventh years of the reign of her present Majesty; and it is expedient further to amend and explain the said Acts in certain respects: be it enacted by the Queen's most excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, that the provisions of the aforesaid Acts, or either of them, as to the recovery of expences, costs, and charges to be paid by any tenant, being a trustee, and not beneficially interested in the lands of which he stands admitted tenant, to be affected by any commutation or enfranchisement under the aforesaid Acts or this Act, shall extend as well to cases in which there shall not be an apportionment on commutation or enfranchisement in pursuance of the said aforesaid Acts or this Act, as to cases in which there shall be an apportionment on commutation or enfranchisement in pursuance thereof.

2. Persons having a limited beneficial interest only may charge expenses on the lands, &c.—And be it en-

4. Provisions for charging and securing of the consideration money of any enfranchisement to extend to cases in which there shall not be an apportionment, &c.—And be it enacted, That the provisions of the aforesaid Acts, or either of them, charging and securing, and authorizing the charging and securing of the consideration money of any enfranchisement under the said Acts, and the costs of the charges, with interest, and also as to the priority of the charges and securities of or for the same, and otherwise in reference thereto, shall, mutatis mutandis, extend as well to cases in which there shall not be an apportionment on enfranchisement in pursuance of the aforesaid Acts or this Act, as to cases in which there shall be an apportionment on enfranchisement in pursuance thereof; and on any enfranchisement where there shall not be such apportionment the charge of the consideration money of the enfranchisement, and the interest thereon, shall commence and be computed from the date of the conveyance, deed, or assurance by which the enfranchisement shall be made.

9. Act may be amended this session.—And be it enacted, That this Act may be amended or repealed by any Act to be passed in the present session of Parliament.

POST-OFFICE ESPIONAGE.

COMMONS' REPORT.

As regards intestine commotion, your committee found that a warrant was issued in 1799, to open the letters of seventeen persons at Manchester and Birmingham; one in 1809, to open the letters of eighteen persons in Manchester and Liverpool. In 1812, warrants were directed to the several postmasters of Nottingham, Manchester, and Glasgow, directing them to open all such letters passing through these several post-offices as should appear to A. B. (naming in each warrant some particular individual) to be of a suspicious nature, and likely to convey seditious and treasonable information, or to convey money intended to be applied to the purpose of promoting seditious or other disturbances. A warrant, nearly similar to the preceding, was issued in 1813, to the postmasters of Wareham and Weymouth, in Dorsetshire, and one to the same purpose, in 1817, to the postmaster of Nottingham. Among the names of persons not now living, whose letters were directed to be opened previously to the year 1822, are found those of Despard, Thistlewood, and Watson; and that of Mr. Hunt, once member of Parliament for Preston.

With regard to the warrants issued during the last twenty-two years and a half, your committee have not observed among them a single warrant indefinite as to the number of persons coming within its scope. In every case the names are specified, and in one instance only does the number exceed six. As regards this period, your committee would have abstained from giving particular information concerning any warrant and from naming a single individual whose letters have been directed to be opened, but for the notice which has been taken of the mode of executing certain warrants, and the mention which has been made of the names of the parties included in certain others; these being the circumstances which mainly led to the inquiry which your committee has been appointed to conduct. On these cases, therefore, your committee consider it their duty to report particularly.

The warrants referred to are the following:—

1. During the outbreak in the manufacturing and mining districts, which took place in August, 1842, in the week of the greatest anxiety, a clerk was sent down from the London Post-office, with directions, under the authority of a Secretary of State's warrant, to open the letters of six parties named therein, all taking a prominent part in the disturbances of that period. In the same week the same clerk was directed, under the authority of two other such warrants, to open the letters of ten other persons named, and a fortnight later to open the letters of one other person, making seventeen in all. Most of the persons whose letters were ordered on this occasion to be opened were indicted, and many both indicted and convicted, before the special commission appointed to try the parties concerned in those disturbances. With one exception these warrants were issued between the 18th and 25th f August, 1842, and they were all cancelled on the 14th of October.

About the same time two clerks were sent down to two provincial towns, each with directions, under authority of a Secretary of State's warrant, to open and examine the letters addressed to one individual in each town; but in one of these cases there were no letters to open. One clerk employed on this duty returned to his ordinary business after a week's absence, the other after an absence of five weeks.

2. In the autumn of 1843, during the disturbances which took place in South Wales, two clerks were sent down from the Post-office, into the disturbed districts, with directions, under authority of a warrant from the Secretary of State, one to inspect the letters of one person at a particular town, the other to inspect the letters of another person at another town; and subsequently, under authority of a different warrant, this second clerk was sent to a third town, there to inspect the letters of a third person. In all three instances, the persons whose letters were to be inspected were specifically named in the warrant. One of these warrants was in force eighteen, the other seven days.

It is these facts, probably, that have given rise to the report of a commission or commissions having visited the manufacturing districts, charged with a general authority to open and inspect letters.

3. The third of these cases is that of a warrant to open and detain the letters addressed to Mr. Mazzini. This warrant was issued on the 1st of March, and cancelled on the 3rd of June, in the present year. Throughout that period the intercepted correspondence was transmitted unread from the Home-office to the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. The facts of the case, so far as your committee feel themselves at liberty to disclose them, appear to be as follows:—

Representations had been made to the British Government, from high sources, that plots, of which Mr. Mazzini was the centre, were carrying on upon British territory to excite an insurrection in Italy, and that such insurrection, should it assume a formidable aspect, would, from peculiar political circumstances, disturb the peace of Europe. The British Government, considering the extent to which British interests were involved in the maintenance of that peace, issued on their own judgment, but not at the suggestion of any foreign power, a warrant to open and detain Mr. Mazzini's letters. Such information deduced from those letters as appeared to the British Government calculated to frustrate this attempt was communicated to a foreign power; but the information so communicated was not of a nature to compromise, and did not compromise, the safety of any individual within reach of that foreign power; nor was it made known to that power by what means, or from what source that information had been obtained.

4. A warrant to open and detain all letters addressed to Mr. Worcell and to Mr. Stolzman was issued on the 17th of April, 1844, and cancelled on the 20th of June.

5. A warrant to open and detain all letters addressed to Mr. Grodicki, at Paris, and to another foreign gentleman, was issued on the 3rd of June, 1844, and cancelled on the 13th of the same month.

The last two warrants rested on grounds connected with the personal safety of a foreign sovereign, intrusted to the protection of England. It appears to your committee that, under circumstances so peculiar, even a slight suspicion of danger would justify a minister in taking extraordinary measures of precaution. The committee have not learned that there appeared in the letters that were detained any thing to criminate the gentlemen whom the committee have very reluctantly named.

The committee think it may be desirable for them to make known that the above three warrants are the only warrants to open the letters of foreigners which the present Government has issued.

The warrants issued during the present century may be divided into two classes:—

1st. Those issued in furtherance of criminal justice, and usually for the purpose of obtaining a clue to the hiding-place of some offender, or to the mode or place of concealment of property criminally abstracted, and these, for brevity's sake, the committee will term criminal warrants.

2nd. Those issued for the purpose of discovering the designs of persons known or suspected to be engaged in proceedings dangerous to the state, or (as in Mazzini's case) deeply involving British interests, and carried on in the United Kingdom or in British possessions beyond the seas.

With regard to both these classes of warrants, the object in issuing them has been, in many cases, to ascertain the views, not of the party receiving, but of the party sending the letter.

In issuing these warrants, the mode of proceeding is as follows:

1. In the case of criminal warrants, they do not originate with the Home-office. The application is made, in the first instance, to that one of the two under-secretaries of state who is of the legal profession; and the usual course is for the applicant to state the circumstances in writing; but if the case be very urgent, owing to the time being too short, before the departure of the post, to draw out a written statement, that condition is sometimes dispensed with. The general object of this class of warrants has been already stated; and the principle which governs the issuing of them appears to be, not to make them subservient to private and family concerns, or to the support of a civil right, where an action only could be maintained, as in many cases of fraud or bankruptcy; but to reserve the exercise of the power to those cases exclusively where crime has been committed, and in respect to which there is good ground to believe that correspondence is going on with a particular party, which is likely to lead to detection. If the Under-Secretary accedes to the application, he submits the case to the principal Secretary of State; with whose approval a warrant is drawn by the head clerk of the domestic department, under the instructions of the Under-Secretary, and is then signed by the principal Secretary of State. A record of the date of the warrant is kept under lock and key, in a private book, to which the two under-secretaries and the above-mentioned head clerk have access. To the applicant information is given, according to circumstances, of the post-mark or address merely, or of the contents of the letters detained; or, if the case require it, the original letter is put into his hands.

2. In the case of warrants of the second description, they originate with the Home-office. The principal Secretary of State, of his own discretion, determines when to issue them, and gives instructions accordingly to the Under-Secretary, whose office is then purely ministerial. The mode of preparing them, and keeping record of them in a private book, is the same as in the case of criminal warrants. There is no record kept of the grounds on which they are issued, except so far as correspondence preserved at the Home-office may lead to infer them.

Your committee will here notice a statement which has been made, that instances have occurred of sending entire mail-bags with letters to the Home-office for examination. Your committee are satisfied that no instance of the kind has occurred. None but separate letters or packets are ever sent, out of the ordinary course, from the Post-office to the Home-office, and those never but under a Secretary of State's warrant; and that warrant usually directs that a letter or letters, directed to certain persons, or written in a certain handwriting, be detained; and that either a copy of the post-mark, or of the address, or of the contents, or that extracts from the contents, or the letters themselves be sent to the principal Secretary of State. In some cases the warrant directs that some deputy postmaster shall communicate information to the same effect to a magistrate, or some other person, in the country; and when that is the case, the presence of some third person, named in the warrant, is usually required.

It may, perhaps, be necessary to state that, in some very few cases, the Secretary of State has been required to authorize the Postmaster-General to return to the writer a letter which has been already posted. Some doubt seems to have existed how far this can lawfully be done. In the year 1795, Holland being in the occupation of the French army, one of the principal secretaries of state, by warrant under his hand and seal, detained the entire mails of the 13th, 16th, and 20th of January, intended for that country; and an Act of Parliament (35 Geo. 3, c. 62) was passed to enable the Postmaster-General "to open the letters contained in those mails, and return the same to the parties by whom they were written, signed, or sent." A case nearly similar occurred regarding the Hamburg mail (see 47 Geo. 3, session 2, c. 53) in 1807. The number of warrants issued under this head from 1799 to 1844 is seven, as stated in the abstract.

The general conclusion which the committee draw from the returns before abstracted is, that in equal intervals of time these warrants have been issued in nearly equal number by the several administrations which have been in power from the commencement of 1799 until now. For although in certain years, in consequence of internal commotion, it happened that the number of warrants issued by certain Secretaries of State was unusually great, yet in other years, if they continued sufficiently long in office, the number of warrants they issued for similar purposes proved to be unusually small; so that the annual average of all the warrants they issued, during the whole period of their continuance in office, did not rise materially above the general annual mean.

The general average of the warrants issued during the present century does not much exceed eight a year. This number would comprehend, on an average, the letters of about sixteen persons annually; but how many letters to and from each person coming within the scope of these warrants have on an average been opened, we have no means of estimating, since no record of the number of letters detained and opened under warrant has been kept by the Post-office, but there is no reason to believe that number to be great; and the committee have ascertained that, in the case of many warrants, no letters whatever have been opened. Those which do not appear to relate to the object for which the warrant is issued do not undergo particular examination. Of the average number of days for which a warrant is in force, the committee cannot form any just estimate. It was only as regards the warrants issued from 1822 to 1844 that any return was made to your committee, shewing how long they continued in operation, and in the early part of this period there appears to have been some inattention in seeing to their timely revocation; it is probable that many a warrant had become inoperative long before the period when it was cancelled. In that respect there is a marked improvement in the practice of the present Home Secretary, as compared with that of his predecessors; since the average duration of the warrants issued since September 1841 does not exceed forty days; and in many cases it is as low as three or four days.

From the abstract that has been given of the warrants issued in the present century, it appears that about two-thirds of them were criminal warrants; for by far the greater portion of those marked "uncertain" appear to belong to this class.

REGISTERED ELECTORS IN IRELAND.—Through the instrumentality of Sir R. Ferguson, Col. Rawdon, and Mr. Pierce S. Butler (all Irish members), we have obtained a Parliamentary paper, containing returns of the number of Parliamentary electors registered for each county, city, town, and borough in Ireland, in February 1835, 1837, and 1844, &c. The total number of electors registered to the 1st of February, 1835, amounted to 96,051, and the number of those registered from February 1836 to February 1844 inclusive, to 101,196, exhibiting an increase of 5,145. The number registered to the 1st of February, 1837, amounted to 116,529; and the number registered from February 1836 to February 1844, inclusive, being 101,196, a decrease is exhibited, on the 1st of February, 1844, compared with the 1st of February, 1837, of 15,333. The gross total number of county electors registered in Ireland amounted, in 1835, to 64,189; in 1837, to 74,481; and in February 1844, to 57,981, who were registered between that date and the 1st of February, 1836, embracing a period of eight years, there being at present only an octennial revision of the electoral lists in the sister kingdom. Of these 57,981 county electors, 11,728 are 50*l.* freeholders, 4,886 20*l.* freeholders, 1,435 20*l.* leaseholders, 34,187 10*l.* freeholders, 4,612 10*l.* leaseholders, and 1,133 rent-chargers. Thus it will be seen that the great bulk of the Irish county constituency is composed of the 10*l.* and the 50*l.* freeholders, particularly the former, to whom what is termed the "solvent tenant's test" was proposed by Lord Elliot's Bill to be applied, and the deficiency occasioned thereby to be filled up by the extension of the franchise to tenants paying a rent of 30*l.* a year. In 1837, the number of 10*l.* freeholders was 45,320, or 11,133 more than at present. The gross total number of city and town electors was, in 1835, 20,286; in 1837, 26,693; and in February 1844, 28,137; and the total number of borough electors respectively, 11,576, 11,335, and 15,078. Of these 28,137 city and town electors, 1,204 are 50*l.* freeholders, 561 20*l.* freeholders, 881 20*l.* leaseholders, 211 10*l.* freeholders, 1,449 10*l.* leaseholders, 629 40*s.* freeholders, 14,480 (one-half) 10*l.* householders, and 8,668 freemen. Of the 15,078 borough electors, 257 are freeholders, 14,202 10*l.* householders, 239 5*l.* leaseholders, and 315 freemen. The gross total number of county electors in Ireland now entitled to vote amounts to 57,169, and the number registered after the passing of the Reform Bill was 65,437. The total number of registered county electors on the 1st of February, 1844, amounted to 67,136, and the total number of registered city and borough electors 50,312, making altogether a grand total of 117,448 electors, which is as nearly as possible 1 7-16ths per cent. in proportion to the population. In Great Britain the proportion of the electors to the population is about 5 per cent. or 3 9-16ths per cent. greater than in Ireland.

POOR LAW RETURNS, &c.—A somewhat voluminous Parliamentary paper, purporting to contain a return of the number of orphan and deserted children, under fourt en years of age, at present in the Poor Law Union Workhouses of England and Wales, and of the number of widows receiving out-door relief, with the number of children, under fourteen years of age, dependent upon them for support and subsistence, has been laid before the House of Commons on the motion of the member for Finsbury, Mr. T. S. Duncombe. It was ordered to be printed about three weeks ago, and has just come into our hands. The number of unions in the English counties is stated to be 508. The total number of orphan children (i. e. having lost one or both parents) under fourteen years of age in the various union workhouses, on the 18th of March last, amounted to 15,805, of whom 8,846 were males, and 6,959 females. The total number of children under fourteen years of age who have been deserted by their parents amounted, at the same period, to 6,408, of whom 3,409 were males, and 2,999 females. The total number of widows receiving out-door relief on the 18th of March last, amounted to 71,250, and the total number of children under fourteen years of age dependent on them for support and subsistence, to 102,913. In the thirty-eight unions of Wales, there were 514 orphans (274 males and 240 females); 238 children deserted by their unnatural parents (122 males and 116 females); 5,996 widows receiving out-door relief; and 8,611 children depending on them for subsistence. The grand total for England and Wales (inclusive of places under Gilbert's Act) was as follows, viz. 580 unions; 18,261 orphan children under fourteen years of age (10,205 males and 8,056 females); 7,152 children, under fourteen years of age, deserted by parents (3,813 males and 3,339 females); 85,285 widows receiving out-door relief on the 18th of March, 1844; and 119,310 children dependent upon them for support and subsistence.

THE WEST INDIA COLONIES.—A bulky return of the income, expenditure, and debt, for the years 1841 and 1842, for each of the British West India colonies, has just been printed by order of the House of Commons, on the motion of Mr. B. Hawes, M.P. for Lambeth. The following results are obtained:—Of Jamaica, the incomes in 1841 and 1842 amounted respectively to 261,183*l.* and 321,945*l.* whilst the expenditure was respectively 275,053*l.* and 303,195*l.* The debts due by the island at Michaelmas 1841 and 1842 amounted respectively to 546,267*l.* and 613,297*l.* Of Barbadoes, the incomes of 1841 and 1842 were respectively 68,743*l.* and 73,023*l.*; and the concurrent expenditure 58,419*l.* and 55,503*l.*; the debt of 25,000*l.* due to Great Britain has been all paid off. Of Tobago, the revenue in 1842 amounted to 6,720*l.* and the expenditure to 6,703*l.*; there were no debts due. Of Grenada, the incomes in 184 and 1842 amounted respectively to 17,417*l.* and 15,933*l.* and the expenditure to 12,656*l.* and 12,643*l.* Of St. Lucia, the revenue in 1842 amounted to 11,694*l.* and the expenditure to 11,409*l.* Of St. Vincent, the revenue in 1842 amounted to 18,892*l.* and the expenditure to 12,236*l.* Of Antigua, the revenue of 1842 was 17,083*l.* and the expenditure 15,880*l.* Of Montserrat, the net revenue of 1842 was 1,871*l.* and the total expenditure 2,244*l.* Of St. Christopher, the income in 1842 was 6,933*l.* and the expenditure about 6,974*l.* Of Nevis, the income amounted to 8,834*l.* and the expenditure to 8,678*l.* Of the Virgin Islands, the income in 1842 was 2,332*l.* and the expenditure 2,440*l.* Of Dominica, the income in 1842 was 8,504*l.* and the expenditure 7,880*l.* Of British Guiana, the income of 1842 amounted to 248,895*l.* against 163,579*l.* in 1841, whilst the expenditure amounted to 237,789*l.* against 198,233*l.* in 1841. Of Trinidad, the income in 1842 was 109,545*l.* and the expenditure 71,674*l.* Of the Bahamas, the income in 1842 was 21,943*l.* and the expenditure 23,570*l.* It further appears, with respect to other colonies in other parts of the globe, that the income of the Mauritius in 1842 amounted to 255,209*l.* and expenditure to 188,848*l.*

THE METROPOLITAN PARLIAMENTARY REVISIONS.—We understand that Mr. T. J. Arnold has been appointed by Lord Denman the revising barrister of the lists of electors for the city of London, and has appointed to hold his first cour in the Court of Common Pleas, Guildhall, on Monday, the 16th inst. The proceedings of the first day's sitting will be occupied in receiving from the Secondaries the lists of the livery, and from the overseers the lists of the 10*l.* householders. After this formal proceeding, the discussion of the different claims and objections will be proceeded with in the order, which, at its earliest sitting, will, no doubt, be appointed by the Court. In the letter of appointment issued by Lord Denman in his capacity of Lord Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench, the names of Mr. Lancelot Shadwell, son of the Vice-Chancellor of England, and Mr. D. C. Moylan, are associated, and it is presumed that one of those learned gentlemen will take the revision for the county of Middlesex, and the other that of the boroughs of Finsbury, Marylebone, and the Tower Hamlets. As yet, however, no definite arrangement has been made.

ACTS OF THE SESSION.—On Monday the Lord Chancellor laid on the table of the House of Lords a return of the number of the Royal Commissions assenting to public Bills during the present session; also noticing the dates at which such Bills severally were read the first time in the House of Lords. There were eleven commissions, the last being on the 9th of August. To that period, inclusive, 105 Bills received the Royal assent and became Acts of Parliament. Of that number forty-five, or very nearly one-half, were read for the first time in the House of Lords in the course of July. Eleven were read for the first time in August.

THE MAGISTRATE.

Summary.

WE present to-day to our readers the first article upon the proposed amendments of the Law of Settlement. It is from the pen of Mr. Symons, whose useful work on that subject is well known to the readers of this journal. Nothing else demands particular attention.

THE NEW SETTLEMENT BILL.

No. I.

THIS is among the boldest of the measures of Sir James Graham. The object is to sweep away the entire system of pauper settlements and removals—the growth of two centuries of legislation—and to comprise a new law within the compass of an Act of thirty-eight short sections! We must regard this Bill merely as thrown forth to elicit opinion as to what it may be expedient to do; for though there are certain useful provisions in it, yet, as a measure for practical effect, we should regard it as objectionable, not only because we think it crude in design, but fraught with much perilous change. It has certainly the merit of freedom from all prejudice in favour of established custom; and it is only to be regretted that the skill of the compilation has not done better justice to the courage of the demolition. It is true that the old fabric was cumbrous and untoward, and that the difficulties which beset all great changes in old habits have alone prevented the adoption of a substitute at once simple and comprehensive. Sir James Graham seems, however, to have ingeniously embraced all the perils with few of the benefits of innovation. He figures in this measure as a Destructive enamoured of destructiveness. We shall presently shew that he has made changes, of which the only discoverable principle is change for change's sake; whilst in many cases we find well-beaten tracks and rough old roads, well known by travellers, uprooted in favour of new paths, so vaguely defined and complex, that we fear parishes will be sorely puzzled to find their way along them; whilst the change, at the same time, must increase the number of removals.

The general design of the Bill is, first, to make a clear stage of all existing statute laws of Settlement, Removal, and Appeal; then to reduce Settlements henceforth:—

1. To all such as, according to the present laws, have been already established by actual removal, warrant(a) of removal, or written admission of settlement made before the Act passes.
2. Failing the last-named settlement, to Birth Settlement, of which the evidence is simplified.
3. Failing both the foregoing, to Parental Settlements, such as they will be under the new Act.

These are the positive settlements. Then come two exceptions as to children born in workhouses, &c. and Irish, Scotch, and British Island paupers; and seven classes of cases of irremoveability, some of which form virtually a complicated Marriage Settlement, and another a totally new kind of settlement, which we can only describe as a Resident-industrial-maintenance Settlement; and inasmuch as all cases not provided for are to be relieved where destitution arises, this will supply another class of irremoveables.

Power is given to overseers to admit settlements, and save trouble by amicable adjustment.

There are sections which simplify the evidence of birth, and the taxation of costs in cases of abandonment of warrants of removal. There are then several enactments similar to the old system of examinations and appeals, with provisions for appeals by Boards of Guardians in England and in Ireland, and of Kirk Session, &c. in Scotland. This gives a glance at the skeleton of the Bill.

We shall now proceed to analyze and explain its provisions seriatim, inviting the especial attention of Magistrates, Clerks of the Peace, Boards of Guardians, and Overseers, to their practical bearing. The text may be referred to in the LAW TIMES of Aug. 31, p. 411, and the matter will be found to divide itself under these six distinct heads:—1. Repeal of existing Laws; 2. Settlements; 3. Removal and Irremoveability; 4. Evidence and Examinations; 5. Appeals; 6. Maintenance and Costs.

1. REPEAL OF EXISTING LAWS.

The Act recites thirty statutes, which it repeals. The object is clearly to remove all existing Acts, and substitute one comprehensive one in their stead; this is highly desirable, but the work is somewhat imperfectly done. The statutes require to be more perfectly searched and cleared, but substantially the purpose is answered. It is not of the removal of the old wilderness that we complain, but of the imperfections of the restoration.

2. SETTLEMENT.

The second section starts with a gross oversight; its object is to confirm all settlements already established by removal, or whatever is tantamount to a formal admission of the settlement by the parish in which the settlement is. But it is enacted that a pauper who has "been removed, or directed to be removed, to any parish under any warrant of removal not abandoned or quashed before or after the passing of this Act," &c. shall be deemed to be settled therein. According to this loose language, it is not the least necessary that the warrant of removal or notice of chargeability, or any sort of advertisement, shall have been sent to the parish sought to be charged with the pauper. The order may have been made, and the sending of it delayed; it is nowise incumbent to send it at once; and orders may be now made directing paupers to be removed by thousands, which would fall within the letter of this clause, when the Act passed, defeating its spirit; moreover, there is no provision that it shall be in virtue of the last order whereby removal has been made or directed that the pauper shall be deemed to be settled: an order prior to a subsequent one would also satisfy this clause. This section goes on to provide for appeal against all pre-existing orders as if the Act had not passed. This scarcely removes the evil resulting from the looseness of the former part of the clause. It merely gives a resource in litigation. The Bill will inevitably give a sudden impulse to removals. "Now or never" will be the maxim of all parishes who see either in the existing law or the vagueness of section 2 in the new bill, a chance of ridding themselves of the incubus of paupers even on doubtful grounds of removal. On the other hand, in as far as this section avoids the unsettling of certain settled cases, it is, pro tanto, right: so far so good; but why did not the matter rest here? Why go on and provide for the addition of more settlements to a class which the measure denounces? If the actual removal has not taken place in the wrong direction, why facilitate its being perpetrated now? There is always an evil in removal, abstractedly, which is the principle on which it is best to let existing arrangements remain as they are, as much as possible. The latter clauses in this section seem to let in as much removal and as much litigation as possible on the condemned system, giving it a sort of posthumous power of mischief; mischief, at any rate, in the eyes of the authors of the Bill, or they would not have abolished it at all. This is scarcely consistent.

Section three introduces the new Birth Settlement, or rather the old one turned upside downwards; for, hitherto, it has been the last resource, and now it is to be first sought for in new cases; and when the old settlements have died off it will be the first in all cases; the other being a temporary, but this a permanent settlement; and seeing that the cases are very rare where the birth-place cannot be ascertained of a living person, and the evidence of it being simplified as hereinafter to be described, it may be said that substantially birth will be the main settlement henceforth; invaded, however, by the newly-devised irremoveability, which we reserve for its proper place in Section 8.

Birth Settlements are doubtless very simple in their nature; but, rightly or wrongly, they do not happen to have been hitherto the settlement of any large number of our folk: inasmuch as any other of the eight kinds of settlement supersede them. This is a very important point; for it follows, that by this Bill a vast number of existing settlements will be changed; and did the Bill afford no other ground for it, every parish in the country will put itself into a ferment of birth-place inquiry. Many paupers actually chargeable and quietly maintained where they are, will become removeable, and be removed; and all persons not paupers, who have gained or derived settlements where they are by parentage, service, rate payments, tenement occupany, estate, office holding, marriage, or apprenticeship, who may have located themselves and lived to old age where they are, will be hereafter liable to be "warranted" away whenever they want relief, unless they have been born where they have lived, or are otherwise irremovable. Also numbers of persons who by service, tenancy, or otherwise, have gained settlements, after migrating to Manchester, Birmingham, and the other immense fields of newly-grown population, are returnable to their birth-places, while the compliment cannot be repaid by the country parishes; the proportion of burden will thus be clearly disturbed; and it will be seen that the industrial-maintenance-residence-irremovability clause only affects those who have resided for full five years in the same parish prior to chargeability, and in ordinary employment, which, with many in the manufacturing districts, is not the case.

When the birth-place cannot be ascertained, the birth-place or other settlement under the new Bill, first of the father, and then of the mother, becomes the pauper's settlement. As far as our knowledge of these matters goes, we believe that these cases will be very rare. The birth-place of the pauper will almost always be found, and wherever it cannot, it is not likely that that of the parents will be more easily got at. Except, therefore, in the few cases where the parent has been removed, and takes settlement under the second section, this parental settlement will be nearly a dead letter. The clauses which constitute irremovability do not, according to the technical wording of the Bill, constitute settlement; therefore such cases will not give the children above sixteen years of age a settlement where their parents are merely irremoveable; the clause providing that the pauper shall "be settled in any parish in which his father would, if living after the passing of this Act, be settled." Irremovability takes effect where he is not settled.

The Bill extends hereditary settlements only to one generation. The grandfather or grandmother; and, as the Bill terms them, "any more remote ancestors" of paupers, can transmit no right of settlement to their posterity.

By the fifth section of the Bill there are exceptions to the birth settlement in cases where the child is born in a workhouse, lying-in or other hospitals, lunatic asylums, or prisons, the mother not residing in such parishes. In the case of births in workhouses, the clause provides that the child shall take its mother's settlement: in the case of births in hospitals, &c. it is silent as to the settlement the child gains; it is an inference from section 3 that it takes its parent's settlement, but if so, why is it not stated in section 5? The express provision in the case of workhouse births leads to uncertainty how it is to be in the latter part of the same section, where there is an omission of such express enactment as to births in prison, &c. This section is intended as a modification, we believe, of the 9 Geo. 1, c. 7; 54 Geo. 3, c. 170, and other statutes; but if so, why modify them to so little purpose as to create a doubt, where three words would remove it? The section also negatives the birth-place settlements of children born of mothers under warrants of removal, without any enactment where they are to be settled. It is now held on the authority of R. v. Salkeld,(b) that the child is settled where the mother shall be decided to be settled. But section 3 would make the father's the child's settlement, and the Act ought to provide plainly for these cases, and remove all doubt both as to legitimate and illegitimate children born under these peculiar circumstances.

Section 6 assists the repeal section, and enacts that no person shall be deemed to be settled in any parish in any other than one of the several manners herein provided; and this renders it the more incumbent that the settlements intended to be given should be more explicitly defined.

We shall recur to this subject next week.

BASTARDY.

1. APPLICATION FOR ORDER IN.

March 6, 1844.

Clerk of Newcastle-Emlyn Union—Stated, that an application had been made by the guardians of the Newcastle-Emlyn Union to the justices in petty sessions, at Trelech, in Carmarthenshire, for an order of affiliation of a male bastard child of Mary Davies, on Thomas Howell,—the notice stating the chargeability to be in the parish of Kilrhedin, to which parish Mary Davies was then chargeable. The application was dismissed by the justices, on the ground that it was not preferred within three months from the time of the chargeability first occurring. It was proved that Thomas Howell kept out of the way to avoid service within the three months. Mary Davies subsequently became chargeable to the parish of Kenarth, and was sent by the relieving officer to the union workhouse, being then chargeable to that parish. The guardians made application on behalf of the parish of Kenarth to the justices in petty sessions, at Newcastle-Emlyn, for an order of affiliation. On the hearing, the counsel for Thomas Howell objected that it was not competent for the justices to entertain the case, it having been dismissed when the chargeability was to the parish of Kilrhedin.—Requested the Commissioners' opinion upon the case.

Ans.—Although the terms of the 1st section of the 2nd and 3rd Victoria, c. 85, are by no means free from doubt, the commissioners, looking to the object of that statute, are disposed to think, that an order of affiliation cannot now be made on Thomas Howell, in respect of the bastard child of Mary Davies, under the circumstances stated in your letter. As both the parishes of Kilrhedin and Kenarth are in the Newcastle-Emlyn union, and as the guardians of the union, and not the overseers of the respective parishes, are the parties to apply for the order, the application might have been made within three months from the commencement of the first chargeability; and as the object of the statute was, to enforce some limitation of time on application for orders, it would in fact be defeating its intention, and doing away with the restriction, to hold that the guardians could apply, on a chargeability occurring in another parish in the same union, after omitting or failing to obtain the order in the first instance. At the same time, the commissioners admit that the expressions in the Act—"when any child, &c. shall become chargeable to any parish, &c."—certainly leave room for doubt; and it remains, of course, for the justices themselves to act according to their own view of the intent and purport of the statute.

2. EVIDENCE OF AUTHORITY TO MAKE APPLICATION IN BASTARDY.

Feb. 7, 1844.

Clerk of Skipton Union—Inquired, whether in applications in bastardy it was competent for the solicitor for the putative father, under 5 & 6 Vict. c. 57, to call for the production of a copy of the board of guardians' minute, signed by the chairman, sealed with their seal, and countersigned by the clerk, authorizing the application to be made. It had not been the clerk's practice to produce a copy of such minute; and in cases of removal his virâ voce evidence of the fact of chargeability had been deemed to be sufficient.

Ans.—In the opinion of the commissioners the putative father might very properly request, and the justices might also very properly require, the production of a copy of the guardians' minute, duly signed and sealed, authorizing the application for the affiliation order. The statute (5 & 6 Vict. c. 57) expressly points out a mode of proceeding in such cases, calculated to remove all doubt as to the authority for the application to the justices; and the commissioners are not aware of any reason why that course should not be followed. With regard to the proof of chargeability, the statute does not declare that what was legal evidence of chargeability before its passing is not to be deemed legal evidence now, although it simplifies the proof. It appears to the commissioners that the justices may proceed upon any other legal proof of the chargeability, besides that referred to in the above-mentioned statute.

3. BASTARD—COST OF MAINTENANCE.

Feb. 24, 1844.

Clerk of Market Drayton Union—Stated, that application had been made to the guardians for relief for Henry Chesters, an illegitimate child, aged fourteen years, who was then ill; an order of affiliation had been obtained prior to the passing of the Poor Law Amendment Act, and the putative father had paid towards the maintenance of the child till some time after the passing of that Act, since which time the mother married. Inquired,—whether the guardians ought to apply, in the first instance, to the putative father, or to the husband of the child's mother, for its maintenance; and if the application ought, in the first instance, to be made to the mother's husband,—whether, in the event of his being unable to maintain the child, the putative father could be called upon to do so.

Ans.—Having regard to the decision in Lang v. Spicer (1 M. & W. 129), the commissioners apprehend there can be no doubt, that the stepfather of Henry Chesters is primarily liable for the child's support. Whether in the event of the stepfather being unable to maintain the child, the putative father can be called upon to contribute to its support, is not so clear. But, looking to the tenor of the remarks made by the judges in the case of Lang v. Spicer, the commissioners think it, at least, very doubtful whether the putative father would be held liable, in such a case as that of Henry Chesters.

4. RECOVERY OF RELIEF TO THE MOTHER.

Feb. 15, 1844.

Clerk of Hursley Union—Stated, that on the 27th Dec. 1842, a pregnant young woman was received into the workhouse of the Hursley Union; on the 13th June,

(b) 6 Maule & Sel. 408.

1843, she gave birth to the child who had been previously affiliated. The father of the child had been absent until recently, and he, the clerk, was now called upon to make out an account for the maintenance of the mother and child, including the fee paid to the midwife, to be presented to the justices with the view of enforcing payment from the putative father. A doubt having been suggested as to the liability of the putative father to the expense of maintaining the mother, and to the midwife's fee, requested the commissioners' opinion on the subject.

Ans.—The commissioners call your attention to the second and third provisos in the seventy-second section of the Poor Law Amendment Act; from which you will perceive that the amount recoverable from the putative father, under an order of affiliation, is in no case to exceed the actual expense incurred for the maintenance of the bastard child while chargeable to the parish; and that no part of the money paid by the putative father, in pursuance of the order, is to be applied in any way to the support of the mother. The midwife's charge being an expense incurred on the mother's behalf, is not recoverable under the order.

Summary.

THE decision of the three law lords, overruling the majority of the judges, and the opinion of Lords Lyndhurst and Brougham, occupies the thoughts of every one in the Profession, as to its legal results; while the public at large are equally engrossed with the consideration of the strange uncertainty of the law, and the anticipation of the course which the martyrs, or lucky conspirators (the term varies according to the respective political tenets of the speakers), will now take. We had hoped to have obtained a printed copy of the opinions of the judges, but were disappointed. They are, however, now to be printed for the use of the House of Commons, and we shall probably then recur to them. The other important decision in Gray v. The Queen will be reported at greater length next week, as, through the kindness of Lord Brougham, we have been furnished with a copy of the judges' opinions. We shall give next week the first of the promised articles on the Transfer of Property Bill.

THE PROPERTY LAWYER.

WHAT IS THE ENJOYMENT OF A RIGHT WITHOUT INTERRUPTION.

This interesting question was raised, argued, and determined in the case of

(Reported 3 Q.B. N.S. 581.)

The facts of the case were as follows. The plaintiff claimed a right of common of pasture for cattle levant and couchant, on Newby Moor, by reason of the possession of a certain farm called Measingscales, of which he was tenant, and the tenants for forty years previously had exercised such right, save that, about eighteen years before, the owner of the farm occupied it, and having no commonable cattle, did not use the common for two years. Upon these facts a verdict was taken in the court below, and ultimately in the court above the question was raised whether this cesser of enjoyment for the two years defeated the plaintiff's case, the stat. 2 & 3 Wm. 4, c. 71, ss. 1 & 4, requiring that the profits should "have been actually taken and enjoyed," "without interruption, for the full period of thirty years" "next before" action brought.

It will be unnecessary to repeat the arguments of counsel, or to collect the cases cited, for the point was a new one, and the judgment alone is important to the reader.

The Court unanimously ruled that the common had been enjoyed for the full period of thirty years, notwithstanding the interruption.

"DENMAN, C.J.—I am of opinion that the thirty years' enjoyment was sufficiently made out. There must be some interval in the enjoyment of all such rights, and it must be a question for the jury in each case, whether the right was substantially enjoyed for the requisite period. It has been ingeniously argued that a thirty years' enjoyment cannot have taken place where there has been a two years' intermission. But the words of sec. 1 are 'without interruption,' not 'without intermission.' And the intermission must be a matter open, in every case, to explanation. Sec. 6 enacts that no presumption shall be made in favour of any claim, on proof of the right having been exercised for a less period than that prescribed by the Act in the particular case. But that provision is meant only to encounter presumptions, from an exercise of the right during such an imperfect period, that it was exercised in older times. The effect of the clause is that a claimant, proving enjoyment for less than the specified time, shall not, on that ground, carry back his right to a period before that which his proof extends to. But this does not affect the mode of proof; and, where actual enjoyment is shewn before and after the period of intermission, it may be inferred from that evidence that the right continued during the whole time.

"PATTESON, J.—I think there is no difficulty in the construction of the statute. 'Interruption' in sec. 1 must clearly mean an obstruction by the act of some other person than the claimant, not a cessation by him of his own accord. And when especially we refer to sec. 4, which provides that no act shall be deemed an interruption unless 'acquiesced in' for one year after the party interrupted shall have had notice, there cannot be the slightest doubt on the point. Indeed the defendants' counsel did not rest the case so much on interruption as on sec. 6. By sec. 4 it is enacted that the period to be relied upon must be one immediately preceding the commencement of the action; and sec. 6 excludes any presumption from proof of the exercise of right during a less period than the previous clauses require. Formerly an immemorial enjoyment was presumed from proof going back to the extent of living memory; now, by sec. 6, that is no longer permitted. But no difference is made as to the proof of an intermediate user. It is always for the jury to say whether, during any intermediate part of the period, an actual enjoyment has been had. How many times the right has been exercised is not the material question, if the jury are satisfied that the claimant exercised it as often as he chose. It is suggested that the argument for the plaintiff might apply equally if there were a cesser for seven years. I am not prepared to say that it would not. It might be that, under the circumstances, the party had no occasion to use the right. The question would always be for the jury. So long an intermission would be a strong piece of evidence against the continued right: but it would be for them to determine. The Act makes no provision for such a case, sec. 6 relating only to the non-presumption of right at a period antecedent to that over which the proof extends.

"WILLIAMS, J.—I am of the same opinion. 'Interruption' means an obstruction, not a cesser or intermission, or any thing denoting a mere breach in time. There must be an overt act, indicating that the right is disputed. Before the statute, in cases relating to common, it was very usual to explain the ceasing to turn on cattle by the fact that there were not, at the time, commonable cattle to turn on. No necessary inference arises from a cesser during two, three, or seven years. In this particular case enjoyment for the requisite period was abundantly made out."

THE LEGAL PROTECTIVE ASSOCIATION.

[BY OUR OWN REPORTER.]

IN pursuance of the advertisement which appeared in our columns on Saturday, and in those of the daily journals, a meeting of members of the Legal Profession was held on Monday last, at the Gray's Inn Coffee-house. There were about sixty members present.

DAVID WIRE, Esq. having been called to the chair, said, that he had been placed in that prominent situation by the unavoidable absence of his learned friend Mr. Ashurst, and he hoped that the meeting would excuse any defect he might possibly make in his attempt to perform the duties he had undertaken, and trusted that he should meet with their support. The object of the meeting had been stated in the advertisements; it was for the purpose of forming an association for the protection of the members of the Legal Profession. The necessity for such an association, doubtless, would be made evident to everybody in the room, and to the Profession at large. (Hear, hear.) It might, however, be asked, what was the necessity for another association, seeing that there was already one association of the members of the Profession, incorporated by royal charter, and having duties like those which were proposed to be intrusted to this association? Now, it was true there was an association of what might be called the aristocracy of the Profession that had been formed, and to whom had been delegated the power of endeavouring to better the condition of the members of the Profession, by preventing irregular practitioners from creeping into the Profession, by watching over all the interests that might affect professional men, and by occasionally lending its aid and sanction to new and important measures for the reform of the law. Had they, then, a necessity for this meeting? Simply, he apprehended this—that the society which they were anxious to form would embrace many objects which were not embraced in the old institution, and would be more active, and would exhibit a greater desire to undertake duties connected with the advancement of the interests of the Profession than could be expected of the old corporate body. He knew that the junior members of the Profession had long felt that their interests had not been adequately represented by the Law Society (cheers); why that was, of course he could not tell. Although a member of that body, he pleaded guilty to never having been present at any one of its meetings, and consequently if they had not moved so quickly and so promptly as they ought to have done to protect the interests of the Profession, he had to take upon himself part of the blame for so doing. But when the advertisement that convened this meeting was read, it would be seen that there were many objects that were embraced by this society, and which could not be undertaken by the larger society; but, let it be understood, as between the two bodies, there would be neither hostility nor collision; one should attempt to assist the other, and both should move together harmoniously to accomplish the objects that brought them together. (Hear, hear.) The advertisement stated that one of the objects of this society was to promote and support the general interests and privileges of the Profession. Now, doubtless those who did not belong to the Profession would think this a very self-interested motive, and undoubtedly it was so (hear); why should it not be? Why should not the lawyers, as such, have their own interests at heart as much as any other class of men in the empire? (Hear.) They had certain privileges committed to them by the Legislature to exercise for the general benefit of the community; it was, therefore, right and proper they should meet, associate, and combine to watch over those privileges. Now, how did they become possessed of their privileges? First of all, they had to serve a clerkship of five years, and on entering on that clerkship they had to pay a heavy duty to Government; on the expiration of that clerkship they were subject to a rigid examination as to their knowledge of the profession on which they were about to enter, and if they were found qualified, they had to be admitted, and again the revenue met them and they had to pay a large sum in the shape of stamp-duty, on obtaining their certificates. The revenue did not leave them there, for so long as they were in practice it met them every year, and demanded from them fo. the privileges conceded to them for practising, an annual sum, so that the Profession might be said richly to contribute to the revenue for the privileges conferred on them after a proper examination of their qualifications. He, therefore, thought it right they should meet and associate together for the purpose of protecting the privileges which they had dearly purchased, and which they yearly paid to keep. The next object of this association was to watch over all legislative interference tending to curtail or abrogate the just rights of the Profession. Now it was known that various Acts of Parliament had been from time to time passed which the members of the Profession felt had infringed their duties and cut down their emoluments under the shape of reform. He had ever been, and he trusted he should continue to be, a legal reformer in the highest sense, yet he felt satisfied that if these measures that had lately been carried through the Legislature had been submitted for examination to the Profession at large, who had the interests of the public to watch over—while all that was necessary for the sake of reform would have been carried, the just rights of the Profession would not have been curtailed. (Hear.) Now, what was the object of all this reform? Had it enhanced the Profession in the estimation of the public? Had it increased their respectability? He replied that it had not, and that in every court in which practitioners had been admitted it would be seen there had been a deterioration in the character, respectability, and qualifications of the Profession. Now, was this right for the public? To whom did the public look? To the professional man—the man of station—the man of education—as one who had a character to lose, and who, seeing the great interests which were committed to him by his client, would sooner do any thing than sacrifice those interests. But see how those interests had been sacrificed. See how many persons who had attached themselves to men not qualified to practise—who had crept into the Profession irregularly, or who were practising in the name of attorneys to whom they paid an annual sum—see how they had to complain of the exorbitant charges for business conducted by that class of men, and the consequent loss and misery they had to endure. Now, he said, all these evils were created by the Profession not having taken proper steps to protect their interests; and while, on the one hand, he believed the Profession at large were not less anxious than others of carrying those just measures which were for the protection of the poor as well as the rich; on the other hand, they would not have engaged in those rash, ill-judged, and unfortunate measures which had received the sanction of the Legislature. (Hear.) Now, another object of this society was to suppress, oppose, and prosecute (if necessary) all cases where unqualified persons usurp either the duties, profits, or privileges of the Profession. Now, here he begged to say he thought the Law Society had not done its duty. (Cheers.) He was not opposed to it—he hoped this society would not be opposed to it; yet he thought that, after the formation of this society, the Law Institution would be compelled to do its duty; and it would then be seen that that class of persons he had alluded to would entirely disappear from the Profession, and the practice would simply be confined to those regularly admitted, and who had a standing and character. (Cheers.) Another object of this association was to assist in obtaining all useful and practical reforms and amendments of the law. He was pleased to find this as one of the items in the enumeration of the objects of this society; because, if he had come to this meeting and found it simply an association of his brethren in the Profession to oppose all just and practical reform, he should have recoiled, and not become a member of the association, because he did think that the law, like all other sciences, must progress with the increase of intelligence and the wants of the people. (Cheers.) As time was the great innovator, as a Lord Chancellor had once observed, undoubtedly there were innovations and alterations necessary to meet the coming exigencies and the intelligence of society, and, therefore, the law could not stand still any more than any other branch of science or trade. It was, therefore, essentially necessary that there should be just and practical reform—that they should place the law within the reach of the poorest, and yet that the richest should not be allowed to escape; and he was satisfied that the only way to attain those just, practical, and useful measures of reform was to embody the Profession in an association, to watch over the crude measures of men who were neither lawyers themselves, and could never have the necessary qualifications to fit them to be legislators. (Cheers.) Let them look at the laws as they were framed and embodied in Acts of Parliament two or three hundred years since. If they took up an Act of Parliament of that date, and looked at it, they would find it simple in language, clear, and intelligible; imposing penalties without ambiguity, so that every man, though almost a fool, could understand an Act of Parliament at that period. And why? Because the greatest of all intelligence, and the most extensive of all learning, were always applied to the construction of an Act of Parliament; and, prior to its being introduced into the House of Parliament, it had the sanction of the great heads of the Profession. (Hear.) But, nowadays, instead of any such thing as that, a man got into Parliament, and by virtue of his seat, assumed the quality of a legislator, and, without understanding the first elements of law, the first thing he did was to try his hand at constructing Acts of Parliament. Look at Acts of Parliament, and see how they have multiplied! Instead of being reduced into a small compass, so that the lawyer might take almost all the written laws in his pocket in the Long Vacation, and study them at his leisure; now he needed two or three waggon loads, if he would understand the number and variety of acts and offences and rights to be secured, or attempted to be secured, by Acts of Parliament; so that it had become a proverb and byword that Acts of Parliament were so constructed that never one passed the Legislature but what one might drive a coach-and-six through it. (Hear, hear.) Now this ought not to be the case, but an Act of Parliament should be plain, intelligible, simply accomplishing its object, embracing one object, and only one within the meaning of the Act. Therefore, he was delighted to find that one of the objects of this association was to assist in obtaining useful reform—not to obstruct Lord Brougham, the greatest law reformer of the age, the man who knows most theoretically and least practically of the law of any man—(hear, hear)—the great legal functionary who was raised to the present condition he enjoys of honour, simply through the favour of the Profession—the man who seemed to have had given to him the gift of speaking that he might utter calumnies on the body by which he had been raised into eminence, and who used his power to obstruct the course of justice, and to intercept the mercy of the Legislature. (Hear.) He thought the Profession were better judges than Lord Brougham of the practical operation of the law (hear), and though he might, in his fallen state, desire to raise up his reputation by being the poor man's friend (hear), he (the chairman) wished it to go forth to the public that there were other poor men who needed the protection of the law as much as the poor debtors. (Hear, hear.) There were such men as poor creditors; there were men who had trusted their property into the hands of others, and who ought to be assisted by the law of the land in having cheap and efficient remedies to punish the fraudulent debtor, and to compel the unwilling to pay; and the sympathy of the public and of the Profession should not be wasted altogether upon those who languished in prison simply for this reason—in 99 cases out of 100—because they would not yield an honest account of their property, nor give satisfaction to the creditors who had been compelled to put them there. (Hear.) Why, he could tell the meeting of many cases, within his own limited experience, of debtors who had been year after year in prison, because they had refused to do justice to their creditors; and yet the whole and entire sympathy of the public was to be wasted upon persons of bad character and fraudulent intentions, who have been trusted by those who have no adequate remedy to recover their debts. Another object is to maintain the respectability of the Profession by an honourable and liberal mode of practice. Now he liked that, and doubtless every gentleman in the room liked it. (Hear, hear.) They all liked to be on terms of friendship with one another; and though they might be opposed to each other in the different suits in which they were professionally engaged, that was no reason why their personal feelings should be estranged, and that they should not sympathize in a spirit of friendship, in a desire to carry on the practice of the law with an honourable and liberal feeling, and with an anxiety only to do justice to the interests confided to their care. (Hear, hear.) He felt satisfied that that anxiety might be gratified to the utmost by discountenancing the shabby practice of all shabby practitioners, by marking them out as men out of the pale of the community, and who, having crept into the Profession as they had done, ought to be scouted by every honourable man. (Hear.) Another object was to adopt measures for obtaining a friendly co-operation with all law societies (provincial or local) having similar objects in view. This of course was only carrying out the object before mentioned; and ti was of the highest importance that they should have communication with their brethren scattered over the country; and he knew that many of them would hail a society like this, and belong to it, and be ready to communicate anything affecting the interests of the Profession and the public at large. He had now stated—he was afraid, from having been called to the chair very unexpectedly—very imperfectly, the objects of the institution they had met to form. He regretted there were not present some of the elders of the Profession; but when he looked to the period of the year, when every one who could was anxious to get away to enjoy himself and recruit his health and strength, to enable him to renew his labours at the proper time, he was only surprised to find so large a meeting as that before him: and it proved the necessity of the association, and the anxiety of all to belong to it, and to promote the objects communicated in the advertisement. He was requested to announce to the meeting that the public had not yet quite made up its mind that Lord Brougham was right in the legal measures he had introduced; and as a proof of that, since Thursday night last there had been sent up to the committee petitions from nearly 200 of the principal towns in England, including the very domicile where Lord Brougham lived,—Penrith, Carlisle, and Appleby,—against the last Act of Parliament, settling forth the evils likely to accrue from it, and expressing the opinion he (the chairman) had before expressed, that it was desirable that in all future legislation, both creditors and debtors should be taken into account. The petitions, however, which had been got up contained upwards of 15,000 signatures; so that it was quite apparent, that if the question had been put to the country, as to the propriety of granting Lord Brougham's Bill, the country would have answered by a very large majority, that it had better have been postponed until some practical persons had looked at its details. (Hear.) Lord Brougham himself did not understand the Bill, and it had received a different interpretation from the judges, to whom its operation had been intrusted.

Mr. GODFREY GODDARD then said, that the resolution he had the honour to propose was, "That all attorneys and solicitors, beside being compelled to serve a clerkship of five years, and obliged to pay heavy duties and other fees, both on their articles and admissions, and also a considerable stamp-duty for liberty to practise, that such duties were imposed by the Legislature for the purpose of insuring the respectability of the Profession, by keeping the practice of the law in the hands of properly educated and responsible persons; and that it is essentially for the benefit of the public at large that none but persons duly qualified should be allowed to practise in any of the Courts of Law, Equity, or Bankruptcy." Those were the words of the resolution, and to shew that the Profession was entitled to some protection on the part of the Legislature, and to shew that they paid for the protection they ought to receive, he would merely read a few words to shew the annual amount the Profession paid to the Government of this country. The number of persons practising as attorneys in England and Wales was nearly 11,000, having paid for their articles of clerkship 120*l.* each, amounting to 1,320,000*l.*; in addition to which they paid for admission 25*l.* each, making 250,000*l.* more; and they were paying for certificates an annual sum of 100,000*l.* In spite of all this, the Profession were now called on to surrender the rights and privileges which they had paid for, and they would have to do so, unless they bestirred themselves, and took an opportunity of speaking in their own defence. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. LEWIS FRAMPTON seconded the motion, which

The CHAIRMAN put to the meeting, and it was carried unanimously.

Mr. FYNMORE then moved the next resolution, as follows:—"That it is notorious that various unqualified persons, under the pretence of being clerks or agents to attorneys and solicitors, are in the habit of practising as attorneys both in the courts of law and bankruptcy, to the great detriment and injury of the qualified practitioner, and in defiance of various Acts of Parliament which impose heavy penalties on all parties so offending." He believed this fact was so well known to most of the members of the Profession, that he felt satisfied it would be the object of this association to punish such parties as far as they could. (Hear.) Reference had been made to the Incorporated Law Society, and it was much to be lamented, perhaps, that they had not taken proceedings against parties who had so offended; but when the power was placed in the hands of an individual society like that now about to be formed, he trusted they would feel it to be to their own interest to prosecute all such parties. (Cheers.)

The motion was seconded by Mr. FITCH, and carried unanimously.

Mr. WATSON rose to move the next resolution, and expressed his regret that the honour of moving it had not fallen into the hands of a more experienced member of the Profession. There could, however, be no question of this, that the time had arrived when it behoved the Profession at large to unite themselves for the protection of their mutual interests. Unfortunately for some of the Profession, the very name of a lawyer had become a byword, and even a disgrace, in the minds of the many. (Hear.) He trusted that the members of this association would exert themselves to place the Profession in such a position in society as its respectability merited. He concluded by moving the following resolution:—"That, in order to protect the rights and privileges of the Profession against such unjust and illegal interference, and to prosecute and punish the same in all cases where it can be satisfactorily detected, and to assist in obtaining all useful and practical reforms and amendments of the law, it is expedient that an association of the attorneys-at-law and solicitors of the United Kingdom be forthwith formed, this meeting being decidedly of opinion that such an association will insure an honourable and liberal course of practice in the Profession, and confer an important benefit on the community at large."

The motion having been seconded by Mr. BLAKE, was put and carried unanimously.

Mr. TOWNSEND, in moving the next resolution, said, that he felt fully persuaded that the enemies of the Profession, and the friends of a certain noble lord, would not read an account of this meeting without making observation on its proceedings and those who composed it; that they would be told they were getting up an association for their own profit alone; and that it would be said they were afraid of their pockets, and of their profits being diminished, and that people would be afraid to go to law, for that the lawyers were like second Neros, and desired to hunt men to prison. Now, he begged to say that lawyers were as humane men as the generality of persons (hear); that, like all other parties in the community, they were affected by bad laws, but as far as this late measure of Lord Brougham was concerned, the lawyer would profit rather than suffer from it. (Hear.) It might be a matter of some surprise at first, that, as lawyers, they took such an interest in this measure; but they were men knowing the law, they were men of intelligence, and most likely to see the ruinous consequences such a Bill as that would bring upon a commercial nation like England. He considered that the Insolvent Debtors Act, if allowed to remain, would operate in favour of the attorneys, who would grow very quickly rich, whilst the nation would become bankrupt. He was sure they would all deplore that, for they were not such mercenary men as to desire to profit themselves by the ruin of their neighbours (hear); but the consequence of this Act would be that creditors would soon have to follow their debtors to prison, in consequence of the losses they would sustain. It had always been the intention of the Legislature to insure a respectable body of practitioners, because they knew that, whatever the law might be, unless it was carried out by a respectable body, it never would be beneficial or satisfactory to the community. Although there were a great many black sheep in the Profession, yet, as a body, they stood respected. Every one, he was sure, would concur with him in deploring the fact that there were a large number of persons who were willing to forget the high station they ought to occupy as members of a learned Profession, and for a few paltry shillings to prey on the public, and bring dishonour and disgrace on a learned and respectable body. (Cheers.) He concluded by moving the following resolution:—"That such Association be and the same is hereby accordingly formed; and that every qualified member of the Profession who shall signify such his desire in writing be and he is hereby admitted a member of the Association; and that the expenses of maintaining and carrying out the objects of the same be defrayed by an annual subscription of one guinea from each member."

Mr. CLARKE, in seconding the motion, said the chairman had stated in his address that this was indeed a time when a combination of the Legal Profession was necessary, if it was ever necessary; and he fully concurred in that statement. Mr. Goddard had brought to the notice of the meeting a statement of the large amount of money which the Profession paid annually to the Government; but there was something besides that to be noticed: the Profession supported and maintained about 25,000 clerks and their families, and were also the means of supplying large fees and paving the road to eminence and promotion of about 2,000 members of the Bar; some of those members, after having been obsequious to the attorneys—after having obtained their business, and having obtained the means to the ladder by which they stepped into the Profession, no sooner arrived at the top than they kicked down, abused, and vilified the Profession. (Cheers.) It was, perhaps, an ungrateful return of that kind that had led to the Profession meeting this day. Allusion had been made to the existence of the Law Institution; it was not the wish of the present association to speak disrespectfully of that institution, but to co-operate with it, to lead it, or to follow it. (Hear, hear.) So long as they worked together, their own object would be obtained. He thought that the conduct of those legal members who had in their place in Parliament supported certain enactments that had been passed to the prejudice of the Profession demanded their notice. Why, in the recent Poor Law Amendment Act, no thought was taken of the Profession. That Act was what might be termed a "dig" at the Profession. (Hear, hear.) The very clerks to the boards of guardians, and divers other officers, were by that Act made ex officio attorneys for the purposes of the boards of guardians. This was allowed to pass quietly, and what followed? why, an Act to let in what Lord Brougham had pleased to term agents and clerks of the Court of Bankruptcy. Now there were numberless cases that occurred in which the Profession was abused and parties injured and robbed by unqualified persons. He could mention several such persons within his own experience, partly as a clerk and partly as a professional man; but the members of the Profession did not like to take up a case individually, whereas if they had a body to appeal to who would do it without wasting time and expense—if a body existed who really would work—much good would be done to the Profession. They really wanted a working association, in which every man who belonged to it would work as if for himself. (Hear.) He remembered a case of a poor woman taken in execution, who fell on her knees to the officer, and declared most solemnly that she never had been served with any writ, had never received a declaration, and had never received any process whatever, and, in fact, the first intimation she received was that of the officer. He (Mr. Clarke) was told by the officer that there were hundreds who did this sort of thing, and on asking him his private opinion, he said it was an abominable affair, for the poor woman never was served with any process at all. He (Mr. Clarke) did not like to take up the case upon his own responsibility. It was a very cruel case, and on considering it with one or two friends, he did take it up and went to the Appearance office, and found an appearance entered in the name of an attorney for this poor woman. He asked her if she had ever employed that attorney, and she said she did not know him. He then went to the attorney, and asked if he had entered the appearance, and he said he had not, but that he knew the handwriting, which was that of an accountant who was practising in his name, but he repudiated him. He then found, to the disgrace of the plaintiff's attorney, that the same man was practising in his name. He (Mr. Clarke) indicted the man, and a true bill was found, but the prisoner removed the case by certiorari, and there being nobody to whom he could apply to assist him in the expense, the scoundrel got off.

Mr. GRAAFE.—Did you apply to the Law Institution?

Mr. CLARKE.—I was told it would be useless, because I was not a member. Now, a short time since, a client came to my office, and said that he had been in difficulty, and had been served with a copy of a writ of execution. He had given the case to some one, but he began to be afraid, and he came to me to advise him what to do. He said he did not know the state of the proceedings, nor what the party was. I asked him who was the plaintiff's attorney, and on going to him I found that this man, whom the defendant had employed, was an accountant, and that he had entitled himself to final judgment. I took out a summons for time to plead, and the next morning the defendant came to my office with the very man. I asked him for his power, and he said he was concerned for the defendant; and on asking him what he was, he gave me his name, and said he was an accountant. Well, this man had entered an appearance for this poor man, for which he had charged him 1*l.* He had drawn a release from the creditors, for which he charged him 2*l.* 10*s.* "down;" and on going through the charges, he flatly denied having made them, and became so insolent, that I ordered him out of my office. I saw that man yesterday in the Court of Bankruptcy deliver a brief to counsel, and I saw the counsel take it from him! (Sensation.) Since then, the poor man who had employed this accountant came to me, and shewed me a receipt for five or six pounds that he had paid this accountant for settling with his creditors; and he said that it had cost him, besides that, 15*s.* a day for eight or ten days, going round with this man and some brokers, treating them to drink. I told him that he had better come to a professional man, who would not dare to act in such a way. This accountant is but a type of that class of men whom Lord Brougham would send into all our courts; and if it is not time to make a stand against such an innovation as that, then our occupation is gone. Now it was well known (he continued), that when a young practitioner had a client who was in difficulties, and he called a meeting of creditors, it sometimes happened that that meeting was called in the room of an accountant; the accountant bought the assignment, and did what the professional man ought to do, who was therefore mulcted not only of his proper fees, but was deprived of much of his business, by persons who had no right or pretensions whatever to practise in the Profession. And there was something to be said about the receipts of counsel. He had seen a letter reflecting much on the Profession, in which it stated that they marked larger fees on their briefs than the counsel were in the habit of receiving; and that letter was very quickly replied to by another solicitor, stating that it might be the case, that barristers frequently received a small fee before the case was tried, and afterwards the fee was increased and they signed their brief. That, however, was equally dishonourable to the counsel. It was equally dishonourable for a counsel to receive a brief knowingly from an unqualified person. Now it struck him, that a great deal of the odium that was heaped upon the Profession was on account of their exorbitant costs. If a debt was only 2*l.* 1s. it was liable to all the expenses of 19 guineas or 20*l.*; and where the debt was 20*l.* 1s. then the scale of costs was the same as if the debt was 100*l.* It seemed to him that the costs should be proportionate to the amount of the debt, and not that the defendant should have to pay so large an amount of costs as was frequently paid for a very trifling debt. He thought that the Profession ought to propose such a thing themselves,—they ought to lead in this matter. (Hear, hear.) The parties who framed the law that had been commented upon did not know how these things worked, whereas the practitioner saw it every day, and no other set of men ever could carry out the objects of this association. (Hear.)

The resolution was then put and carried unanimously.

The CHAIRMAN remarked, that he did not think the bar as a bar was a whit purer than the attorneys as attorneys. (Hear.) He had found many dishonourable men amongst the members of the bar, but if all his professional brethren had taken the course he had adopted, they would soon put down the practice they complained of. He never suffered a counsel to hold a second brief of his whom he ever found vilifying and abusing the attorneys without just cause. He never gave a brief to a counsel who did not attend to his duty. He never marked a fee for a counsel to be in the Exchequer when he ought to be in the Queen's Bench. He never allowed counsel to insult him; he treated them as gentlemen, and had always met them as such. He was satisfied that if the members of the Profession were to see counsel receive briefs in the Court of Bankruptcy from accountants, and instantly published the fact to the Profession, such men would have no more business.

Mr. TURNER then moved "That an interim committee, consisting of twelve persons, viz.—Mr. Bolton, Mr. Blake, Mr. Fynmore, Mr. Fitch, Mr. Goddard, Mr. Surr, Mr. Turner, Mr. Townsend, Mr. Wire, Mr. Watson, jun. Mr. Wedlake, and Mr. Wright, be now appointed to draw up such rules and regulations as they shall deem advisable for the government of the association, and to submit the same for adoption to a general meeting of the members to be held so soon as the regulations are prepared. That at such general meeting a committee of management for the ensuing year be appointed; also a secretary and such other officers as may be deemed necessary; and that in the meantime Mr. Edward Clarke, of No. 5, Bedford-row, be requested to act as honorary secretary."

The motion was seconded by Mr. FITCH, and, having been put, was carried.

The CHAIRMAN hoped that there would be a universal feeling among the Profession, and that this would be a successful attempt to unite that which had hitherto been scattered and disjointed into one firm and compact body, and he was sure the public would have great reason to rejoice if such should be the case.

Upon the motion of Mr. GODDARD, seconded by Mr. FYNMORE, a vote of thanks was given to the chairman for his able conduct in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN, in returning thanks, trusted that this meeting would prove the beginning of a better order of things, and that every member of the Profession would feel that he was placed in a responsible situation, in which he had high and important duties to discharge, and that he could only perform them satisfactorily so long as his conduct was above all reproach, and beyond the slightest imputation of any person.

The meeting then separated.

ON THE EVIDENCE OF SCIENTIFIC MEN BEFORE LEGAL TRIBUNALS.

THE opinions delivered by men of deep research in their own peculiar departments before legal tribunals are daily becoming the theme of wonder and ridicule to the public at large. Scarcely is there a trial involving a great question, that ought to be solved by those who have studied the points connected with it most deeply, than there is a collision of evidence, amidst the mockery and the sneers of the barristers, whose object is, of course, to win the cause, and not to arrive at truth.

The conflicting testimony of medical men upon the subject of insanity has tended to shew that the judgment formed by persons of common sense, perfectly impartial, is quite as valuable and as much to be relied upon as the professional scrutiny of those who declare that they devote themselves to the examination and to the treatment of the insane. But medical evidence has unfortunately been long at a low ebb, and solicitors have every reason to believe that they can purchase it at graduated prices, and when we see the cases which have been subjects of the law courts, we cannot be much surprised at it. We find, for instance, such a trial as that which was brought by the widow of Mr. Kinnear, the banker, to recover 2,000*l.* from the Rock Assurance Company, in which six medical men, two of them physicians, after a careful examination of the dead body, pronounced upon the cause of death; while on the other, surgeons of eminence, who had not that advantage, asserted that it must have been by poison, without assigning any other reason than that they were not satisfied with the opinions of the six other gentlemen.

We may possibly find some excuse for the difference of views upon subjects which are somewhat speculative, and that require rather the exercise of the reasoning faculties than of the senses; but what are we to say of the practical chemists of the day, who should take nothing for granted, who ought to be guided solely by experiment, whose manipulations should prove the truth of their views? Yet the opinion is now tolerably prevalent that no reliance can be placed upon them, for we find their evidence upon matters of fact diametrically opposed to each other. We constantly observe in the daily press that upon a trial Professors A, B, C were for the plaintiff, and D, E, F were for the defendant, assuming as a fact that if subpœnaed by the plaintiff, D, E, F would have been his witnesses, and A, B, C those of the defendant, and that there had been a struggle not to arrive at truth, or to tell all that was known, but that the party who paid for the evidence was to have the benefit of every thing that could be found in his favour, and all that appeared prejudicial was to be carefully kept back. At the same time we are prone to believe that not one of these professors would be tempted by any sum to a deliberate falsehood; but they allow themselves to be biassed by their clients, they have taken up a one-sided opinion, and even should they in the progress of their inquiries find they laid hold of a wrong idea, they think they are bound in honour to go on in the path in which they have commenced their journey, and try to prove it to be the only one that leads to truth.

That carelessness—we must not call it ignorance—sometimes leads the public to undervalue the opinions of scientific chemists, we must concede. The late case at the Excise Office is an instructive one. We find two of the first chemists asserting that in a certain liquid there is not the trace of spirits, and we find Dr. Ure shewing by analysis that actually three-fourths of the fluid is spirit. A case has just occurred which has involved some very interesting questions, and two of our most distinguished chemists were employed, Dr. Ure and Mr. Phillips, against each other; and whilst it was a singular sight to see two such eminent men brought into collision with each other, each anxious to shew the superiority of his own views, it led rather to the conclusion that science was a marketable commodity, which might be brought to assist those who could afford to pay her handsomely.

Mr. Brookes, the proprietor of an estate at East Cowes, in the Isle of Wight, had embarked a large sum of money in an extensive speculation for the building of numerous villas. He considered himself fortunate in having found brick-clay upon the property, and commenced the manufacture of bricks upon a large scale. He baked them in clamps instead of in kilns, which latter are preferred by most brickmakers, because there is less waste, less fuel consumed, and the bricks are sooner burnt. A clamp is thus formed; its foundation is of dried bricks just made, upon which the bricks to be burnt are built up tier upon tier; between each layer of bricks are two or three inches of cinders, from which the ashes have been sifted, and to which the technical term breese is applied. The fire-place and its flues are constructed differently, according to the wish either to dry the bricks speedily or slowly. As the combustion goes forward, emanations and effluvia are of course given forth. Mr. Barwell, the proprietor of East Cowes Castle, who was the immediate neighbour of Mr. Brookes, found these vapours not only disagreeable to the senses, but laboured under the impression that they were highly destructive to the vegetation, and that they had most decidedly injured his plantations. He accordingly obtained an injunction from the Lord Chancellor against Mr. Brookes, the consequence of which was, the clamp was extinguished, and a most serious loss sustained.

Litigation having once commenced, it was carried on with most energetic decision by both parties. Chancery suits sprung from it, and, after various hearings on both sides, the Lord Chancellor referred it for arbitration to Mr. Swanston, an eminent chancery barrister.

Both parties seem determined to carry on litigation regardless of expense. The proprietor of East Cowes Castle called witnesses to prove the injury his trees had sustained. As it has been a generally received opinion that the ordinary vapour from a brick clamp in action has no injurious effect, it was necessary to prove that there was some unusual circumstances attendant upon this clamp, and Professor Phillips gave evidence that the breese employed by Mr. Brooks differed from that which is usually burnt, and that it contained sea salt; this becoming decomposed at a high temperature, gave forth hydro-chloroic acid, which produced the deleterious effect complained of.

This argument created considerable interest, and evidently much influenced the arbitrator. Dr. Ure, however, not only exposed the fallacy of the doctrine, but shewed by actual experiment that the temperature was not sufficient for the evolution of the gas, but that from the clay ammonia was given out. The two learned chemists insisted upon these most contradictory opinions, and the arbitrator was sorely puzzled between them.

Botany was called in to lend its aid to solve the problem. Dr. Sigmond and Mr. Rogers gave it as their opinion that the trees which were declared to be destroyed were unhurt, and that their apparent unhealthy state was to be attributed to their exposure to the south-west blast, which has a striking influence on vegetation throughout the Isle of Wight. All evidence, however, was of little avail; the arbitrator could arrive at no decision after the big war of opinion of the chemists; he condemned each party to pay his own costs, and dismissed the case. Nearly 5,000*l.* have been spent, both parties are dissatisfied, the chemists are laughed at, and had the arbitrator gone down to the Isle of Wight on the day he gave his undecisive opinion, after six months' deliberation, he would have found the trees, whose supposed decay had been the cause of the conflict, in full bloom and beauty, and the vegetation even more luxurious than it had been in former years.—Polytechnic Review.

METROPOLITAN BUILDINGS ACT.

(From the London Gazette Sept. 3.)

Office of Woods and Works, Whitehall, Sept. 3.

The Commissioners of her Majesty's Woods, &c. hereby give notice, that they have, in pursuance of an Act passed in the present session of Parliament, cap. 84, intituled, "An Act for Regulating the Construction and the Use of Buildings in the Metropolis and its Neighbourhood," appointed No. 3, Trafalgar-square, Charing-cross, in the city of Westminster, to be, until further notice, the Office of the Registrar of Metropolitan Buildings, and of the official referees appointed under the said Act.

The Commissioners of her Majesty's Woods, &c. hereby give notice, that in pursuance of an Act, passed in the present session of Parliament, cap. 84, intituled "An Act for Regulating the Construction and the Use of Buildings in the Metropolis and its Neighbourhood," they have appointed Arthur Symonds, of the Middle Temple, esq. Barrister-at-Law, to be Registrar of Metropolitan Buildings; and the said Arthur Symonds hath, on this 3rd day of September, instant, made the declaration required by the said Act, before the Right Hon. Sir Robert Monsey Rolfe, one of the Barons of her Majesty's Court of Exchequer, at his house, No. 8, Spring-gardens, in the city of Westminster.

The Lord Chancellor has appointed William Blackman Young, of Hastings, in the county of Sussex, gent. and Richard Waring, of Luton, in the county of Bedford, gent. to be Masters Extraordinary in the High Court of Chancery.

The Venerable Unwin Clarke, Archdeacon of Chester, has been pleased to appoint Mr. Francis Boydell principal Registrar of all the Rural Deaneries (12) within the modern Archdeaconries of Chester and Manchester, on the resignation of Mr. Simpson the late principal Registrar, who is about to practise as a Proctor at York, in the courts of His Grace the Archbishop.

NEW CHURCHES.—On the 30th ult. the 24th annual report of the Commissioners for Building new Churches was printed. In the last report it was stated, that in the year 316 churches had been completed, in which accommodation had been provided for 379,662 persons, including 209,323 free seats, appropriated to the use of the poor. Since the last report 10 churches have been completed, in as many counties, in which 10 churches accommodation has been afforded for 9,979 persons, including 7,273 free seats for the use of the poor. Thus, in the whole, 326 churches have now been completed, and provision has therein been made for 389,641 persons, including 216,596 free seats appropriated to the use of the poor. It is further stated by the Commissioners, that 28 churches are now in the course of building, to the erection of which pecuniary aid has been granted by the Commissioners out of the funds at their disposal. Plans for 18 churches have been approved of, and two additional plans are under consideration. Conditional grants have been made for the erection of a number of churches mentioned in the report, and other applications which have been made are set forth. Several consolidated districts have been formed, as well as district chapelries. It is stated, that church extension on the parochial system has increased, and then comes the statement that the Commissioners are willing to afford facilities for obtaining additional "burial grounds" in the parishes they specify. The Commissioners have under consideration several applications for the perpetual patronage of new chapels which it is proposed to build and endow.

Tuesday was the first court-day of the Insolvent Debtors' Court since the passing of the New Insolvent Act, and the consequence of that enactment was shewn in the fact, that during three weeks only forty-three prisoners have applied for bail, while in ten days last year the number was nearly 120.

QUALIFICATIONS FOR THE BAR AT ALABAMA.—After the formality of an introduction, the judge said, "Well, Mr. C. you want to be examined for admittance to the bar?" "Yes, Sir." "Well, Sir, let's take something to drink. Barkeeper, give us two juleps." After drinking the juleps, the judge said, "Mr. C. can you swim?" "Yes, Sir, I can," said C. greatly surprised. "Well, Sir, let's take another drink. Barkeeper, two cocktails." The cocktails vanished, and the judge said, "Mr. C. have you got a horse?" "Certainly, Sir," said C. "Very good," said the judge, as soberly as though charging a grand jury. "Mr. C. if you please, we'll take a drink. Barkeeper, two toddies." The toddies disappear, and C. owns he began to feel rather queer. "Mr. C." said the judge, "can your horse swim?" "Yes, Sir, he can, for I have tried him from necessity." "Then, Sir," said the judge, with increasing gravity, "your horse can swim, and you can swim, and by ——, I think you are well qualified for an Alabama lawyer. Give me your commission, and I will sign it. Meanwhile, barkeeper, give us two punches for my friend, Mr. C. and myself. Mr. C." continued the judge, "I drink success to your admission to the Alabama bar."—Boston Times.

CORRESPONDENCE.

LAW INSTITUTION.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

SIR,—The accuracy with which you report all matters connected with our Profession, and the zeal which you evince for its interests, cause me to regret that you had not a reporter present at the annual meeting of the Law Institution, instead of relying upon the reports in the daily papers for the information furnished.

I have been a member of the Law Institution for some years, and although I took a pretty active part in the proceedings of the day, remonstrating very warmly upon the acquiescence of the society in the unprecedented mode of posthumous compensation to the holders of the discontinued offices in the Court of Chancery, no notice whatever was taken of my observations in the daily newspaper reports.

Although newspaper notoriety is neither essential to my private or professional prospects, there is one matter introduced by me to the notice of the meeting, which I think of such importance to the institution, connected with its utility to the Profession, that I shall seek the medium of your valuable journal (denied me in the daily papers) of bringing it under the serious consideration of those of your readers who are members of the Law Institution, or inclined to join it.

This society originated in an association called the Metropolitan Law Society for preventing abuses in the Profession, in which Mr. Anderton (now a common councilman, under-sheriff, &c.) took an active part as secretary, and much good was then done by the society.

Upon its merging into the Incorporated Law Society it became the custom to select the committee of gentlemen to superintend the working of the institution from the heads of the Profession, and considering that it is the duty of some of these gentlemen to act in the important capacity of examiners of candidates for admission as attorneys, it was highly desirable on all grounds that gentlemen of eminence and standing should be at the head of our affairs.

But it has struck me for a long time past, that in addition to this committee (not one of whom I should wish to see displaced) there should be a changeable sub committee of solicitors actively engaged in the exercise of their Profession, conversant with all its haunts, from the stone flags of the Judges' chambers to the carpeted purlieus of the House of Lords, feelingly alive to all its abuses, and eminently capable of exposing the absurdities of the crude legislation upon the alterations of the law, which have latterly occupied our wise legislators; for be it remembered to our sorrow, that our branch of the Profession is wholly unrepresented in Parliament; and the very judges' clerks could successfully oppose even the small concession of allowing a London solicitor to administer an oath, and save his client a trudge up to the Temple or Southampton-buildings.

The respectable and intelligent patriarchs of the Profession, who so worthily occupy the council board of our institutions, may be said to be out of the professional world, and (beyond the pleasing excitement of attending now and then to receive a cheque at the Accountant-General's) know little of the arcana and present working of the Profession, which, with its multifarious changes, would much astonish them in going the round of the offices.

Entertaining views like these, and considering there never was a time when the active co-operation of a united body of solicitors was so much needed, I gave a notice of a motion to be discussed at the next meeting of the Society, for the formation of a sub-committee, composed of members in the active exercise of the duties of their Profession, to bring under the notice of the general body all matters connected with the interests of the Profession, and especially all Bills brought into Parliament for the alteration of the law; and I shall be much obliged by your bringing my propositions under the notice of your readers by the insertion of this communication.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,
THOMAS LOTT.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENTS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

SIR,—I feel so earnestly the importance of answering every argument which the advocates of judicial bloodshed can advance in support of their awfully barbarous doctrine, that I am induced to trouble your readers with a word or two in reply to the second letter of Mr. Giles, jun.

If it be not understood how it is that the Mosaic criminal code, being addressed to the Israelites alone, is nevertheless binding on all the world, Mr. Giles has not rendered the mystery less unintelligible by informing us that this code is an example of perfect legislation, adapted to human nature, so that its enactments are not obligatory upon any mere section of mankind, but upon mankind in general. This is an assertion which is totally unsupported by experience, and is, moreover, philosophically absurd; for, notwithstanding Mr. Giles's statement to the contrary, human nature undergoes a change amounting almost to a complete metamorphosis during man's progress from his primary state of wild savageism towards social civilization, and it would be impossible to frame a code of laws which should serve for man's guidance as well in one state as in the other.

To prohibit a crime is one thing; to fix a punishment for committing a crime is another thing; and that legislation cannot be perfect which prescribes a punishment not calculated to prevent the crime it prohibits. In this case is the Mosaic law forbidding murder and dooming murderers to death, for the object of it is to prevent murder, which it does not do, but, on the contrary, as there is statistical reason for believing, operates as an incentive to the commission of the crime. Either, then, the Mosaic code is not a perfect one, in which case we cannot be required to give it implicit obedience; or it is local and temporary in its applicability, and was intended only for the guidance of those to whom it was immediately addressed, and with whom it might, for aught we know to the contrary, have a beneficial influence. The truth is, in my judgment, Moses, when he led the poor bond marked Israelites out of Egyptian slavery, found them rude, barbarous, and brutal, not controllable by mild laws, and he wisely adopted rigorous ones; but no more did he dream of making those laws binding on all mankind, in all times, and in every place, than any modern lawgiver would dream of such an object with regard to his own enactments. Mr. Giles seems to think the people for whom Moses legislated occupied the very pinnacle of civilization, having a "high moral tone to maintain amongst themselves," and therefore capable of setting forth an example to all future generations of mankind, as comparative barbarians of the nineteenth century among the number. It looks a pity, if this were so, that, instead of conducting them direct through the wilderness to the promised land, where their moral influence would have been felt and appreciated, he led them to and fro and round about in the wilderness for forty long years, literally wasting their fragrance in the desert air. Did it never suggest itself to Mr. Giles, that the great Jewish reformer had an object in this? That, knowing the Israelites were too debased for civilized society, he conceived the only hope of exalting his race to a moral pre-eminence lay in gradually drilling them out of their rude habits, and teaching them so to educate their children that the next generation would be fit to enter society on a good footing, and to take there a high position amongst mankind? Did it never occur to Mr. Giles that it must have been to work out such a plan as this that Moses promulgated the bloody laws which made death (by the horribly cruel process of stoning, in some cases) the dread penalty for murder, theft, witchcraft, adultery, stubbornness in children, &c. laws which, acting violently on the fears of a barbarian people, would restrain them from committing such outrages as from their moral degradation they were prone to commit? To my thinking, this is a most feasible supposition, for harsh laws are only adapted to savage natures, and become wholly abhorrent when the civilizing process has advanced. A civilized man has a horror of human slaughter, despises thieves, points his finger in scorn at the adulterer, trounces stubborn children, and laughs at witchcraft; while a savage will butcher a man as thoughtlessly almost as he would an ox, has no respect for the property of another, indulges his animal passions without restraint, sees no sin in filial obstinacy, and superstitiously believes in and practises the necromantic art. What lawgiver would legislate for these two classes of men in the same terms? Where is the punishment which, addressed to "human nature," would be equally effectual and proper for them both? "Echo answers, 'where'?"

As a moral precept, "Thou shalt do no murder!" is universally applicable, and it is of paramount importance to enjoin it on all men, as well savage as civilized, and whatever their race, Carib, Hindoo, Esquimaux, Peruvian, or European; and if it could not be practically enforced without adding "Thou shalt not suffer a murderer to live!" that command also should be universally enjoined; but the contrary being the fact, as we have ascertained by a blood-bought experience, our very respect for human life should lead us to adopt some other means of protecting it. Indeed, I seriously contend that every supporter of the Mosaic code violates the spirit of that code by advocating the infliction of capital punishments. What was the object of that part of the Mosaic law against murder, which says, the murderer shall be put to death? To prevent murder—Does it prevent murder? No. On reference to my former letter it will be seen there is fair statistical reason for believing it increases the crime. By obeying one part of the law, then, we frustrate the object of the whole: by fulfilling it to the letter, we violate its spirit and intent.

Mr. Giles's attempt to escape from the dilemma in which he found himself by the argument at the close of my former letter is very unsuccessful indeed. How can he put the poor handcuffed, imprisoned, helpless criminal, who stands alone, with the whole body of society concentrated in the law he has broken to oppose him?—oppose—nay, overwhelm and crush him. How can he put this contemptibly weak thing in comparison with an invading foe, armed to the teeth, strong in numbers, with the free earth to manœuvre upon, and us to conquer if we don't conquer it? It were vain to say the cases are not parallel. I repeat the argument in question with as firm a confidence as ever.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,
E. F. SLACK.

MONOPOLIZING CLAUSES IN LEASES.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

SIR,—Being frequently applied to by regular clients to prepare deeds of assignment, both absolute and by way of mortgage of property held under lease from a large landowner, and which leases were originally of a vacant plot of land, at a small ground-rent, for the purpose of being built upon, and generally for the term of 999 years, some of recent date, and still in the possession of the original lessee, I have been startled by a proviso in such leases that in case the lessee, his executors, administrators, or assigns, should, during the demise, assign or set over the said term and premises, or any part thereof, except by his or their last will and testament, without giving notice thereof in writing to the lessor, his heirs or assigns, or his or their steward or agent, at their usual place of abode, or leaving same at the mansion on the estate sixty days at least before such assignment, or in default of performance of the covenants and agreements on their (the lessees') part to be performed, it should be lawful for the lessor upon the premises thereby demised, and the buildings to be thereon erected, to re-enter, and the same to re-enjoy, as in his and their first estate; followed by a covenant that all deeds of alienation, mortgage, or assignment of said premises, or any part thereof, should be prepared by the attorney or agent of the lessor, his heirs or assigns, or such other person as he or they should appoint.

Of the impropriety of introducing such clauses when there can be no other object than to endeavour to monopolize, on the part of the attorney preparing the lease, the future conveyances of the property, there cannot, I think, be two opinions, and I feel strongly disposed to treat such clauses after the manner recommended by Mr. Hayes, in the opinion communicated to the Law Times by Mr. Kelly, vol. 2, p. 160, in reference to a similar act of cupidity—"simply to disregard them." Must the lessor, and all others claiming under him, during the whole term of 999 years, in immediate want of funds, first give sixty days' notice to persons he knows not, or at a house which may be a ruin? Must he submit his affairs to the inspection of an attorney chosen by other parties, who may be a stranger to him, and live at the distance of a hundred miles, or, what is worse, perhaps, his personal enemy, or forfeit his property, rendered valuable by the erection of buildings? He may not even know that there is any such attorney.

As the subject involves a point of professional practice, I trust that you will consider this letter worthy of a place in your columns, in order that the opinion of my professional brethren who have had experience in such matters may be elicited as to the legality of such clauses, and their effect on an assignee or mortgagor under such leases when they have been disregarded.

Yours obediently,

August 28, 1844. One, &c.

MEDICAL REFORM BILL.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

Sir,—Among the important Bills to be discussed next session is the Medical Reform Bill. Its leading provisions are beyond our province, but its mode of dealing with quackery is fit matter for the lawyers. We may leave all bearing upon education, examination, and the ascertainment of the relative position of grades to the doctors; but when we see a body of men in most respects like ourselves threatened by the toleration of fraud, pretension, and ignorance, I hold that we deserve deprivation of our own protective laws unless we heartily and zealously co-operate.

No rational mind can trace a distinction between the two professions; one has health and life for its guardianship, the other all which makes those desirable. To the honourable fulfilment of functions so precious, the best faculties of the mind are devoted in an expensive training, and afterwards, in their prime energy and development. Both are eminently mental occupations; both rewarded by the station of gentlemen, unbounded confidence of employers, and the opportunity of attaining the elevated satisfaction of doing the greatest good. Both are exposed to the deep injury of quackery; the fraudulent pretender robs us as individuals and debases us as a body; and in both his success results from the profound faith misfortune reposes in its source of succour. If not our own cause, it should suffice that it is our own enemy; the mendacious cunning of unscrupulous men, by nature and acquirement perfect in the art of duping. That is the foe.

It is sufficiently familiar that an unqualified person, acting as an attorney or solicitor, cannot recover any fees, and is liable to imprisonment; and more than half the value of the protective punishment lies in the power every person has to put in motion the machinery which incarcerates.

The proposed Medical Reform Bill disqualifies unregistered persons for public appointments, but leaves the rich harvest of private practice open to depredation.

It disallows the recovery of fees by action, and thus elevates the pretender into the physician.

It makes it a misdemeanor to pretend to be on the register.

The last alone has even the semblance of efficiency; but that has no more. If the looseness of language of sec. 31 be not by accident, it must be by design. The offence which ought to be punished is acting as a medical man without legal qualification; the pretending to be on the register is but one of a hundred modes of deception. We should think it a singular absurdity if a man might do what all solicitors are paid for doing, provided only he does not say he is on the roll. But this emasculated section is the fruit of the false notion that legislation cannot reach quackery.

Sir James Graham and his precursor in the Quarterly Review (December, 1840) remark that, as the pretender cannot be touched, we must encourage the regular practitioner. That the suppression of quackery "no legislation can accomplish." Possibly not; and the case is the same with the vocation of the pick-pocket: Such an observation is a shabby quibble. Nobody looks for its suppression; are we therefore to legalize it? Its patrons begin with a fallacious statement of the extent of remedy sought; they take advantage of an inexpedient argument by the medical men, and then shuffle, by urging the past failure of clumsy legislation against all legislation. It is most true, that quackery, like all other fraud, can never be suppressed. To ask the Legislature to suppress it is seeking an impossibility; but we do ask that it be declared an offence, and made punishable. We will be content with the "great discouragement" of an indictment. Let us have the means of trying, and with patience we will submit to all the mortification of not attaining perfect eradication. "Each individual in society has, with respect to his own complaints, a right to consult whom he pleases," says the Quarterly. Whatever force is found in that argument, is attributable to the doctors unwisely making the protection of the public part of their own case. Let the public take care of itself. If they say candidly, "All the protection we require is for ourselves; preserve to us the legitimate gains of the Profession; the right of the public to become victims we fully concede," they may appear, indeed, somewhat less philanthropical, but assuredly they avoid a popular retort—for the strength of that observation lies in the way it comes out. It may suffice to destroy the argument of the doctor; it destroys the force of his solicitude, but it is worse than weak on the offensive. Pressed against the claim for their individual protection, it could and would be smothered by innumerable instances in other classes.

Then, the inefficiency of the present prohibitions (in general the stimulant of more stringent measures) is strangely put forward to induce a passive submission to the evil. The College of Physicians and the Apothecaries Company have done no good by prosecutions. Be it so, and relieve them from the office. We will not doubt the ponderous movements of a society, almost uninterested, are not difficult to defeat by the active dexterity of a quack, whose name they hear as individuals for the first time; but place the medical profession on an equality with us—define the offence as acting in the capacity of a medical man without legal qualification, and taking reward before or after the service rendered—declare it punishable as a misdemeanor, and who shall doubt the weapon thus placed in the reach of every local protection society—nay, each member of the profession—will rust in the scabbard? My friend, the Doctor, I doubt not, with some slight assistance from us, will contrive to keep his neighbourhood tolerably free from the pestilent intrusion of the pretender. I do trust this struggle will cease to be that of the medical profession alone; its twin brother is bound to join in exalting the opposition into a crusade against a common enemy.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

J. Brocks Ward.

The following letter, which has appeared in the Times, is worthy of consideration:—

THE NEW INSOLVENT ACT.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TIMES.

Sir,—Allow me to suggest that, with all his ingenuity, my Lord Brougham is not yet entitled to the thanks of that portion of the community over which he would fain throw his protective mantle, and to doubt whether many of the parties who have obtained their liberty under the operation of the Act which he has placed on the statute-book will not yet have to condemn his lordship for the hardships it will entail upon them.

As the law now stands, a judgment for a debt under 20*l.* has all the validity it had previously to the passing of the Act (notwithstanding a debtor may have availed himself of its provisions), except that no arrest can be had upon it. Therefore, Sir, what is to prevent a creditor, whose debt and registered costs amount to 20*l.* from bringing a fresh action on the judgment, and when recovered from arresting his debtor as heretofore? This mode of proceeding will, no doubt, be frequently adopted. A man who has reason to believe he can obtain what is due to him only by such a step, will be justified in resorting to it; and a man who has thrown another into prison out of revenge is not likely to be deterred from further gratifying it, when he can do so at an additional expense of 5*l.* or 6*l.* Probably this did not occur to Lord Brougham. If so, I would advise his lordship, in order to effect the object he wished to attain by his Bill, to amuse himself during the recess in preparing another for the "prevention of a multiplicity of actions for the same debt."

Your obedient servant,

Sept. 3. R. W.

SELECTIONS FROM CORRESPONDENCE.

The comments upon sec. 59 of 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96, in the annexed letter are important. We commented upon a similar omission as to the term "judge" in the proposed County Courts Act (supra, p. 152).

I fear there is a laxity of expression in the 59th section of the New Insolvent Act, which will afford a grand loophole for fraud.

That section states, "that if at any time it shall appear to the judge who shall try such cause, &c.—to order the defendant to be detained in execution for any time not exceeding six calendar months." Now, supposing a fraudulent debtor should, in consequence of threatened legal proceedings, make away with his property, as mentioned in the above section, and such legal proceedings should immediately afterwards be taken, and judgment allowed to pass against the defendant by default—either in debt, or on promises—then there is no judge required "to try the cause." Is the defendant in such a case to be let off with impunity?

Again,—Is it intended, by the above section, in cases which will literally come within the words "try the cause," that the complaint should be made at the time of such trial? or when? and how?

If by affidavits, and supposing fraud to be found out after trial, will the debtor be allowed to answer them? or, will he be left entirely at the mercy of the creditor?

The following reply to "Lector's" observation (supra, p. 90, No. 73) upon 1 & 2 Geo. 4, c. 55, deserves insertion, notwithstanding the great number of letters which have already appeared on the question of Stamps on Transfers:—

It surely need excite no surprise that your correspondents have overlooked 1 & 2 Geo. 4, c. 55; because it simply has no bearing upon the question. The recitals and the enacting part both relate to the question whether a given security shall bear an English or an Irish stamp; and the proviso quoted by "Lector" provides for the case of money charged on property in one kingdom and payable in the other; viz. a mortgage of lands in Ireland with a covenant for payment of interest in England.

An Attorney of Wallingford remarks upon Mr. Brocks Ward's letter (supra, p. 90, in No. 73):

I consider the Profession indebted to Mr. Brocks Ward. Allow me to suggest to them that a receipt for the last payment of interest signed by the persons entitled to receive the same will be sufficient evidence of the former payments.

THE LAW TIMES.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 7, 1844.

THE WRIT OF ERROR.

So various are the feelings excited in our minds by the strange result of this case, that we know not how to divest ourselves of them for the purpose of calmly looking at the consequences, immediate and prospective, which may flow from it. Politics is forbidden ground, and we choose not to enter it even upon this occasion. Some journals have found in the decision of the Law Lords a great party triumph, others have congratulated the nation upon the noble proof thus given of calm indifference to every thing but internal conviction. All should, although all do not agree, that in no possible respect could the traversers have had their case more fully considered by the highest authorities of the land. But pass we on, and consider the facts.

All the Irish judges declare certain counts to be unexceptionable. All the English judges and law lords declare them to be wholly bad. All but one of the Irish judges, and most of the English judges, declare that a certain challenge to the array was inadmissible. Lord Denman is of the contrary opinion. Three law lords decide against the opinion of the majority of the judges. In effect they declare that to be law which every one hitherto has regarded not to be law. The lay lords quietly, and, we think, properly, abdicate their functions as members of the court of appellate jurisdiction. What, then, is to follow from all this? First, a universal belief that the criminal law is indeed an uncertainty. Next, that an alteration must be made in the system of appeal. These are some consequences; but the last is somewhat distant. The more immediate is a complete change in the system of criminal pleading—an unquestionable good. We believe from this also we shall see all parties more earnest in effecting a codification of the criminal law. With scarcely an exception, the judicial authorities declare that an offence was committed by the accused parties; yet with all the knowledge that could be brought to aid in carrying on the proper legal proceedings, they stand acquitted, or worse, condemned, and then declared to be entitled to their release. The moral effect of this must be great. The rank of England among nations will be perilled, if the powerful in intellect, the learned in the laws of their country, the high in political station, do not at once make an effort that some security be taken against the recurrence of such a chaos under the solemn name of justice.

LEGAL PROTECTIVE ASSOCIATION.

KNOWING that our readers would be looking anxiously for an account of the meeting advertised to take place at the Gray's Inn Coffee-house on Monday last, we have reported the proceedings at length; and, although very much pressed for space, we cannot forbear offering a few remarks upon them.

The attendance was more scanty than we had hoped, but the period of the year was unfavourable. A stronger reason, however, was, that the circulation of the petition given in our last number unnecessarily mixed up a question upon which there is much difference of opinion, with one about which all who reflect must agree. The abolition of imprisonment is not condemned by all, while all must wish that the other objects of the meeting should be carried into effect. Again, it might have been supposed that an opposition to the Law Institution was intended, whereas the speakers expressly stated the contrary. Indeed, there is no reason why the two should not work together. The letter of Mr. Lott, published in another column, will explain the comparative sluggishness of that body of late years. The motto of the new body should be, "With you if you will, but without you if you will not." We have strenuously and consistently struggled to excite the Profession to unite for the objects of self-protection, assured that the present clamour against them is the consequence of the misconduct of a few members only, while the real grievances inflicted upon the public have been owing to sham-lawyers and accountants. If the present society be carried out on a wide and satisfactory basis—if the provincial societies, assured that their interests will be duly regarded by the metropolitan body, heartily join in the work, then but a short time will elapse before we shall see, and shall feel a just pride in seeing, that what we have so long advocated has been effected. Upon the members of the committee an arduous and responsible duty is imposed; for a failure from any cause now would only discourage and hamper future exertions. Had there been any such body in existence, the obnoxious clause in the Poor Law Amendment Act would have been easily deprived of all, instead of only half, its poison and injustice. In every hearty attempt in this direction we shall always be ready to aid—we shall go on as we have begun. The country Law Societies will do likewise, and whatever may be the immediate difficulties, we fear not that the end will be gained.

SHAM LAWYERS.

WE are rejoiced to say that one of this disreputable fraternity is likely to meet with the punishment due to him. As possibly the report in the daily papers of the case to which we allude may have escaped the observation of many of our readers, we reprint it at length:—

WORSHIP-STREET POLICE-OFFICE.—On Monday a man named Francis Crocker was placed at the bar, before Mr. Broughton, charged with obtaining, under false and fraudulent pretences, the sum of 15s. and a gold wedding-ring from a young unmarried woman named Mary Judd.

The substance of the prosecutrix's statement was, that she was courted by a tradesman named Abel, carrying on business near Aldermanbury, who, after fixing the day for the marriage, and presenting her with the wedding-ring, deserted her and married another woman; and the prosecutrix employed the prisoner, who represented himself as a solicitor, in practice at No. 4, Thatched-house-row, Lower-road, Islington, and Rolls-yard, Chancery-lane, to bring an action for breach of promise of marriage. In this character he obtained the sum of 15s. from her to pay for a writ he told her he had served Abel with, and then the wedding-ring as security for his costs. All this the prosecutrix having sworn to, the prisoner was taken into custody by Holland, one of the warrant-officers, who went to his house on Monday morning and demanded the ring; the prisoner said a friend had it, but on being pressed, acknowledged that he had pledged it; and on being brought to this court and searched, a quantity of duplicates were found upon him, one of which was for the ring in question, together with a letter directed to the prosecutrix, couched in these terms:—"Mary Judd has this day deposited in my hands the gold wedding-ring enclosed, which I promise to return on payment of money advanced by me, and expenses incurred in prosecuting an action against Mr. Abel." On breaking this letter open and looking for "the ring enclosed," a base metal ring, bent into every imaginable shape, and not worth even a farthing, tumbled out.

Frederick Fox, shopman to Messrs. Pickford and Co. pawnbrokers in Old-street, produced the prosecutrix's ring, which was pledged at their shop by the prisoner, on the 13th ult. for 4s.

The prisoner, in defence, denied that he had ever represented himself as a solicitor. He had been employed, he said, for thirty years in solicitors' offices, in one of which he had served as articled clerk. He was last at Mr. Abbott's, in Chancery-lane, but left him in 1841, and had since then acted as reporter, and had been employed by Mr. Gurney. He had intended to carry this business out for the prosecutrix, and had employed Mr. Hutson, a solicitor near Finsbury-square, to transact it for him, but he was sorry to say that that gentleman had not done his duty by him. He had paid Mr. Hutson the 15s. in question, but had no proof, unfortunately, that he had done so.

Holland said he had been to Mr. Hutson's offices, and seen that gentleman's clerk, who told him that the prisoner had certainly been there to give instructions, as he said, for a writ to be issued, but he had not paid them a shilling, and, so far from their firm intending to carry the action on, they had told the prisoner that the letters sent to Miss Judd by Mr. Abel were not sufficient to support an action.

Mr. Broughton said he was clearly of opinion that the prisoner had obtained the property in question by a false and fraudulent representation, and he had no hesitation whatever in committing him for trial; but as the depositions could not be then taken, he would accept bail for his future appearance, and that must be, himself in 100*l.* and two responsible sureties in 50*l.* each. He was subsequently committed for trial.

Here one of the victimized had the courage to come forward to obtain redress, but inasmuch as an injury is inflicted upon the Profession as well as upon the person defrauded by such proceedings, it is the duty of the Profession to combine in putting a stop to them. A hearty co-operation would soon effect this object. One mode we need hardly say must be steadily to discourage and repudiate all connection with such men as Mr. Eaves, one of whose letters we annex. I am instructed to commence an action approaches extremely near, if it do not amount to, a false representation. An attorney who knowingly employs such men is grossly unmindful of his duty to his Profession and to society, which must suffer in the end from any deterioration in the general character and respectability of those through whose means the due administration of justice is obtained.

*Thame, June 28th, 1843.

SIR,—I am desired by Mr. Seamons, brewer, of Thame, to request that on receipt of this you will pay to me for him the balance of your account due to him, otherwise I am instructed to commence an action at law for the recovery of the same. I therefore trust you will make a point of avoiding any further unnecessary expenses by settling the amount on or before Tuesday next.

THE CRITIC.

[New Publications will receive early and impartial criticism in this department of the LAW TIMES, if forwarded to the Office, 29, Essex-street, addressed to the Editor.]

New Books.

The Law and Practice of Insolvents in the Bankrupt Court, according to the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 116, as amended by 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96. Arranged under various Heads, with Cases and Explanatory Notes, and an Appendix of Statutes, including the Debtor and Creditor Act, Orders, &c. with references to the Text and Notes, and a copious Index. By S. C. HORRY, Esq. Barrister-at-Law. London, 1844. Charles Reader.

THIS edition of the New Insolvent Act is evidently by one who has had much experience in the practical working of that branch of the law. He has been able, therefore, to give many cases in illustration of different points which are not to be found elsewhere; he has availed himself also of the various reports that have appeared in the columns of the LAW TIMES—a tribute to their usefulness which we should be ungrateful not to notice.

Mr. HORRY has well amalgamated the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 116 with the new law, and the arrangement of the whole is clear. The omission of a table of contents is, we suppose, an accidental oversight, and to be excused by the quickness with which these new editions are necessarily brought out. The index, indeed, is tolerably copious, but tables of contents are still more convenient, and should always be added.

In the preface, Mr. HORRY alludes to the 6 & 7 Wm. 4, c. 56, and 5 & 6 Wm. 4, c. 70, precedents of the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 116, and the present law, which it would have been well if our hasty legislators had considered and followed somewhat more. By the latter, the abolition of imprisonment was postponed for four years after the Act passed, because probably it was the old law only that had induced creditors to give credit.

On a subject very important to the Profession we extract the following:—

"Attorney when.—The attorney must be admitted of the Court of Bankruptcy, or he will be guilty of a contempt of court. 1 & 2 Wm. 4, c. 56, s. 10; 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, s. 35.

"It is doubted whether loan societies that are not enrolled, or otherwise incorporated, can oppose by their solicitor. In one case Mr. Commissioner Fonblanque said he should take especial care not to allow solicitors, attending on the part of loan societies, to oppose insolvents, without they appeared properly clothed with authority. It appeared that an insolvent had been opposed by the secretary of a loan society, who had deputed a solicitor to attend, but as the promissory note upon which the money had been advanced was only made out in the name of one party, and the solicitor did not pretend to say he had been directed by that party to attend, his Honour declared he had no locus standi in the court. If he attended as the representative of the society, the promissory note ought to contain all the names of the partners associated, but that was not the case, thence a fatal objection on that ground. The commissioners were determined to give no facilities to loan societies, without these societies chose to undergo the ordeal and test for applying for charters, and submitting to the pains and penalties therein contained. . . . He was therefore desirous that this determination of the Court should be promulgated as speedily as possible. Anon. (3 L. T. 198). But in another case, where an insolvent had entered a sum in his schedule which he had borrowed of a life assurance society, and for which he had given a promissory note to one William Coventry, Hughes objected that the solicitor of the society could not oppose for William Coventry, on behalf of the society, as it was not enrolled, and he could not oppose for William Coventry, whose name was not in the schedule, and of whom the money was not borrowed. The payee was in fact no creditor. Hughes then quoted the case of William Meux before Fonblanque, who said loan societies could not oppose by attorney without being enrolled.

"Mr. Commissioner Holroyd observed, that it was admitted on all hands that there was a debt due to somebody, and it might not always be known who were the substantial creditors. People carry on business under various names and titles, but they were not therefore to lose their rights. Supposing the insolvent had been sued on the promissory note by the payee, he must have paid it. He would adjourn the case to allow the name of Coventry to be inserted as the creditor. The case was adjourned accordingly. Re Standen, May 25, 1844."

It is well known that, under 5 & 6 Vict. c. 116, it was a mere chance whether a creditor could successfully oppose the insolvent for a vexatious defence. Commissioners Fonblanque and Fane held it was no ground of opposition, while Commissioners Evans, Merivale, and Goulburn held the contrary. Mr. Horry, however, informs us that, a few weeks since, Commissioner Fane announced that the commissioners had met and determined that it was a good ground.

It seems impossible for any one who considers these Acts not to find some new defect in their construction, and to point out some fresh difficulty, which will impede their professed object, and injure the community. Mr. Horry thus comments upon the ill-drawn 59th section:—

"It is difficult to see how this clause is to be set in operation. It is intended to guard against dishonest debtors taking advantage of the previous enactments, but no mode of enforcing it is pointed out. The first point is, whether the debt be due or not? and this point settled by the trial, is the judge then to inquire into the conduct of the defendant suo motu, or on the suggestion of another? If he do so then, it appears to the author that great public inconvenience will be sustained by suddenly launching into inquiries that properly belong to one of two other Courts. If the conduct of the defendant be not then made to appear to him, how is it to be made to appear to him afterwards? By affidavits, or vivâ voce examination? and when and where? May the plaintiff shew it ex parte, or is the defendant to have an opportunity of explaining his conduct? Under any circumstances, how is he to be brought before the judge? at what time? at the trial, or afterwards? If the facts required to warrant an order for his being taken in execution appear in the course of the trial, or any other time, in what form must the judge make an order? By indorsement on the record, or by a special certificate that the case is a fit one for such an order? Again, as section 57 positively declares that no one 'shall be taken or charged in execution' for a debt not exceeding 20*l.* how is the sheriff or other officer to be compelled to take the debtor, though the creditor do issue execution on such an order?"

This edition is calculated to be of great assistance to the practitioner, and we are confident that between the edition by Mr. Homes, noticed last week, and the present one by Mr. Horry, the public favour will be divided.

THE REPORTS.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Monday, Sept. 2.

GRAY v. THE QUEEN.

Law of peremptory challenge—Opinions of the judges on the following question:—

A B being indicted under the stat. 1 Vict. c. 85, s. 3, for the commission of the felony of shooting [at another person] with intent to murder, challenged peremptorily one of the jurors to be sworn upon the trial; it was objected to by the prosecutor. Ought the Court to have allowed or disallowed such challenge?

[This report is abridged from the opinions of the learned judges printed by order of the House of Lords.—ED. LAW T.]

WIGHTMAN, J.—The offence in question is a felony, but the punishment is not capital; and it is to be considered whether the privilege of peremptory challenge depends upon the quality of the offence or the punishment. The invariable practice in England to allow a prisoner, charged with any felony whatever, whether capital or otherwise, to challenge peremptorily any of the jurors called to be sworn to the number of twenty, raises a strong presumption that its origin was legal, and its continuance of right, and that the privilege is attached to the quality of the offence, and not to the punishment. But it is said that it is allowed only in favorem vitæ, and does not extend to offences not capital. It is hardly necessary to inquire critically into the etymology or original meaning of the term felony, but it is said by Sir William Blackstone (4 Com. 94), that the distinctive incident in felony is forfeiture, and not capital punishment, and that at common law there are offences which are felonies though not capital, and that there are offences the punishment of which is capital though they are not felonies. He gives instances of these, and further remarks, that "the idea of felony is so generally connected with that of capital punishment that we find it hard to separate them;" and to this usage the interpretations of the law do now conform, and therefore if a statute makes any new offence felony, the law implies that it shall be punished with death as well as with forfeiture. This tends to explain how the privilege of peremptory challenge allowed in felony might be considered as originating in favorem vitæ, and accordingly we find in books of the highest authority that the privilege is stated to be incident to felony generally, and the reason assigned by some is that such a privilege is in favorem vitæ. It is said by Mr. Justice Foster (Discourse on Homicide, p. 305) that "at common law all felonies, except petty larceny, rape, and mayhem, were capital offences, unless in cases where the offender was capable of holy orders, and qualified for them;" and it may very well be that felony generally being capital, the privilege was allowed generally to cases of felony becau. : the great majority were capital, though there were some few that were not. In Finch's Law, book 4, c. 36 (of Trial by Jury), p. 414, it is said, "In indictments and appeals of felony the defendant may challenge thirty-five jurors without shewing cause, which is called a peremptory challenge." In Doctor and Student, p. 29, it is said, that "he that is arraigned upon an indictment of felony shall be admitted, in favour of life, to challenge thirty-five jurors peremptorily." Lord Coke (1st Inst. p. 156, b), speaking of peremptory challenge, says, "This is so called, because he may challenge peremptorily upon his own dislike, without shewing of any cause, and this only is, in case of treason or felony, in favorem vitæ; and by the common law the prisoner, upon an indictment or appeal, might challenge thirty-five, which is under the number of three juries." In Com. Digest, tit. Challenge (C), I find, "So in petit treason or felony, by the common law he might challenge thirty-five." Each of these eminent authorities states the privilege of peremptory challenge as applicable to all cases of felony, without exception, though the reason added by two of them does not apply to three or four of the common-law felonies. The opinion that the privilege was incident to the quality of the offence, and not to the punishment, is supported by the fact of the privilege having always been exercised in cases where benefit of clergy might be claimed, and the felony was virtually and practically no longer capital. It may, indeed, be said, that down to 5 Anne, c. 6, the prisoner might not always be qualified to receive the benefit of clergy, as he might not be able to read; but then the necessity of reading to entitle a prisoner to the benefit of clergy was done away with, and any person from that time could obtain the benefit of clergy in all clergyable felonies, and so those felonies practically and virtually were no longer capital; but the parties charged were still allowed their challenges as in other felonies, though there was no longer any danger of their lives in case of conviction. Several statutes appear to recognize the privilege as incident to felony generally, and without reference to the punishment. The 22 Hen. 8, c. 14, enacts that "no person arraigned for petit treason, murder, or felony, should be admitted to any peremptory challenge above the number of twenty;" the 10 & 11 Ch. 1, c. 9, s. 1 (Irish), enacts "that no person arraigned for any offence of high treason, petty treason, murder, manslaughter, or of any other felony whatsoever, shall be admitted to challenge peremptory above the number of twenty:" the 6 Geo. 4, c. 50, s. 29, that "no person arraigned for murder or felony shall be admitted to any peremptory challenge above the number of twenty:" and 9 Geo. 4, c. 54, s. 9, contains a similar enactment for Ireland, and nearly in the same terms.

Upon the whole I think that the origin of the privilege in felony may have been the capital punishment usually incident to that quality of crime, but that the privilege was annexed to the quality of crime called felony, and continued so annexed in practice in England, at least, down to the time when the present question was raised, in all cases of felony, whether the punishment was capital or not, and that it has been recognized as incident to felony generally by the statutes to which I have referred. I am therefore of opinion that the Court ought to have allowed the challenge.

COLTMAN, J.—It appears to me, that by the common law of England the right of peremptory challenge was given in all felonies except in petty larceny, and that it was allowed because the party's life was in jeopardy; but that there is no sufficient ground for saying that the right was to continue only so long as felony should continue to be a capital offence. There is no decision in England to that effect. A dictum, indeed, of Lord Chief Justice North, in Reading's case (7 Howell's State Trials, 264), is supposed to go this extent. The indictment was for a misdemeanor, and the Chief Justice is reported to have said, "You cannot challenge peremptorily in this case, it not being for your life." Now, as to the overruling of the challenge, this decision is quite unobjectionable; what is added was unnecessary. At any rate it is not stronger than the dictum of Parker, C. J. in Rex v. Macartney, which was an indictment of murder, where, on a motion for a special jury, he said, "that there cannot be a special jury in treason or felony, for the party must have the advantage of challenging twenty without cause shewn. (Vin. Abr. tit. Trial, D, a, 2, pl. 5.) This deserves the more attention, as a special jury is never granted in criminal cases except for misdemeanors only. (1 Chitty, C. L. 522.) The text writers of the greatest weight state in general that the privilege was granted in favour of life, as in the passage already quoted (1 Inst. 156 b). Now it cannot, I think, be inferred that because the right was granted in favorem vitæ it must necessarily cease when the life ceased to be in jeopardy. Some of the text writers, however, confine the right of peremptory challenge in express terms to capital cases; for instance, in the book called Trials per Pais, c. 16, it is said, that a peremptory challenge is not allowable, but when the life of man comes in question. So in Wood's Institutes (p. 462), "A peremptory challenge is not allowable but in case of life or death, for which he quotes the above-cited passage from Co. Lift. 156 b, which is insufficient. Other writers lay the rule down without qualification, as Finch (4, 414) and Comyn's Digest (see supra). That the doctrine as stated by the Crown cannot be true, appears to me to be proved by the circumstance of a peremptory challenge being allowed in misprision of treason down to the time of the 33rd of Henry the Eighth. By 33 Hen. 8, c. 23, s. 3, it was enacted, that peremptory challenge should not from henceforth be allowed in any case of high treason or misprision of treason. Now, a peremptory challenge must have been allowed in indictments for that offence, which was not capital. It has been suggested that at one time misprision of treason was a capital offence, for it is said that Bracton considers concealment of treason as being treason, and Lord Coke (3 Inst. 36) says that by the common law concealment of treason was treason, as it appears by Lord Scrope's case. But I conceive this means that an indictment for treason might be supported by proof of a concealment of treason, and in that case the ordinary sentence for treason would be passed; but if the milder course were adopted, of indicting for a misprision, in such case the sentence was not capital; and this view derives support from 1 & 2 Phil. and Mary, c. 10, s. 8, which declares and enacts that concealment or keeping secret of any high treason be deemed and taken only misprision of treason, and the offenders to suffer and forfeit as in cases of misprision of treason has heretofore been used. These latter words evidently point to an ancient recognized mode of dealing with the offence of misprision of treason as distinct from treason, that is, as a misdemeanor. Had the practice been uniform, I should have had little confidence in any opinion at variance with it. But the practice in England and Ireland differs. On these grounds my humble judgment is that your Lordships' question should be answered in the affirmative.

WILLIAMS, J. and GURNEY, B. concurred in this view.

PATTESON, J.—The question necessarily involves some inquiry into the origin and reason of peremptory challenges of jurors; yet I think at last that the answer will depend rather on 9 Geo. 4, c. 54, relating to Ireland, and having the same provisions as 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 88, s. 6, relating to England, than on any thing else. At common law, undoubtedly, thirty-five peremptory challenges were allowed to the prisoner in cases of treason, murder, and felony. It is stated in books of authority that this was in favorem vitæ; it is so laid down in Stamford's Prerogative (lib. 2, ch. 7), also by Lord Hale (H.P.C. vol. 2, p. 268), citing Moore, 12, in which case, however, nothing is said as to its being in favorem vitæ. For the purpose of this argument it may be assumed that the reason was in favorem vitæ. Now, at common law all felonies (whether including petty larceny or not is not material) were capital. The rule therefore as to challenges applied to all felonies. The extension of the privilege of clergy to all persons, whereby practically many felonies were rendered not capital, made no difference. It is said that the reason of this was, because it could not be told, until after a man was found guilty, whether he would pray the benefit of clergy, or if he did, whether it would be allowed, and therefore that all felonies continued capital at the time of arraignment. And this is true after Hen. 6, but not before; for previous to that time the party pleaded that he was a clerk first, and that was tried before the charge of felony (H.P.C. vol. 2, p. 378), and it was found inconvenient in several respects, one being, that thereby the party lost his challenges. This reason leads me to notice here, that peremptory challenges were always refused upon collateral issues; but that practice does not appear to me to affect the present question, for neither the life nor the guilt or innocence of the party was involved in the collateral issue. In England, therefore, until 22 Hen. 8, c. 14, and in Ireland until 10 & 11 Car. 1, c. 9, every prisoner in cases of treason, petit treason, murder, and felony (whether clergyable or not) had thirty-five peremptory challenges. The 10 & 11 Car. 1, c. 9, enacted, "that no person arraigned for high treason, petit treason, murder, manslaughter, or any other felony whatsoever, be admitted to challenge peremptorily above the number of twenty." The 22 Hen. 8, c. 14 was in nearly the same words, and by 33 Hen. 8, c. 3, that enactment was made perpetual. The 33 Hen. 8, c. 23 took away peremptory challenges in cases of treason and misprision of treason, which latter offence was never capital; and this is another argument against the refusal of the challenges.

But I think that 22 Hen. 8, c. 14, and 10 & 11 Car. 1, c. 9, are legislative recognitions of the right of peremptory challenge in all cases of felony. There is no doubt that peremptory challenges have been uniformly allowed in all felonies until the 9 Geo. 4, c. 54 (Irish). Clergyable felonies were during all that time practically not capital, though indirectly, and yet peremptory challenges were allowed in them. Mr. Justice Burton indeed states, in his judgment in this case, that they were refused ever since 1794 in all cases where capital punishment would not be involved, and that would carry the refusal back to a period before the abolition of benefit of clergy. But with all deference, I think that learned judge must be mistaken; for I cannot find any allusion to such a change in the practice, nor can I see by what authority it could have been made. No instance can be found of any person being executed for a clergyable felony. None in which a person convicted of such felony had declined to pray the benefit of clergy, or been refused it. Then came 9 Geo. 4, c. 54 (Irish), which took away clergy, and enacted that felonies should be punished according to the terms of the law respecting each, and none should be capital but those which were expressly so declared, or excluded from benefit of clergy under the existing law; and sec. 9 repeated the limitation of peremptory challenges to twenty. The words there are "other felony," not "other capital felony," and yet it is supposed that these words are to be so limited, the number of capital felonies having been most materially reduced at that time.

But the Crown says that as the 9 Geo. 4, c. 54 has taken away the punishment of death directly in cases where it was before taken away indirectly, but really with quite as much certainty and uniformity, so that the situation of a prisoner as to jeopardy of life is in no respect practically altered, yet the statute is to be construed so as by implication, and by implication only, to deprive the prisoner of the valuable privilege of peremptory challenges, which had been enjoyed by prisoners really similarly situated for several hundred years. Such an implication ought surely to be strictly necessary, whereas here, it is in my opinion not only not necessary, but in violation of the obvious intention, and even of the very words of the 9th section of the Act. If this implication is to prevail, it ought to extend to every other distinction which has been established in favorem vitæ, and the judgment of respondeat ouster upon the plea of abatement, on this very record, is wrong, and ought to have been an absolute judgment of transportation; for this distinction between felonies and misdemeanors had its origin just as much in favorem vitæ as peremptory challenges had. The language of 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 28, as to England, is nearly the same as that of 9 Geo. 4, c. 54, and since that statute prisoners have been allowed to challenge peremptorily in cases of felony not capital, as before; but as the point has never been discussed, I lay no great stress on that practice. The practice and decisions in Ireland appear to have been different. Those decisions are entitled to great consideration, but ought not to prevent me from freely inquiring into the soundness of them, especially as the same common law is in force in both countries, and the statutes which have been passed in pari materiâ as to each country ought to have the same construction. My answer is, that in my opinion in the case put by your lordships the peremptory challenge ought to be allowed.

Parke, B.—It is with regret that I find that I differ from my brethren on the question proposed by your lordships. The question seems to me to be simply what is the rule of the common law upon the subject of peremptory challenge. Is it, that it belongs to all felonies, as incident thereto, or is it that it belongs to all capital offences only? Both sides, I believe, agree that this privilege was given to felonies because life was in danger; but it is said by the plaintiff in error, that being given to felonies, eo nomine, it becomes an incident to felonies generally, and continues, although the reason has ceased; the Crown, on the other hand, contends that the rule and the reason were co-extensive, and that it was given only to capital felonies because they were capital, and for protection of life. It seems to me to be clear that it is not given by any statute; it certainly is not given by express words; and I do not think that the statutes on this subject contain any words which can be construed as meaning to give it. The 9 Geo. 4, c. 54, upon which the existing right of challenge in Ireland depends, contains negative words only: it does not say affirmatively, that in felonies there shall be such a right, it limits that which had existed before; it provides "that no person arraigned for treason, or murder, or for other felony, shall be admitted to any peremptory challenge beyond the number of twenty." The Irish Act, 10 & 11 Car. 1, c. 9, which had been repealed by 9 Geo. 4, c. 53, and which cap. 54 re-enacts, is also in negative terms. It leaves the right in all the felonies in which it existed before, but reduces the number of challenges from thirty to twenty. These statutes, therefore, are of no weight, except as evidence of what the common law was, to be inferred from the understanding of Parliament. For it may said, that if the Legislature had understood the privilege to be confined to capital felonies, it would have so stated, more especially after the recent passing of 9 Geo. 4, c. 53, by which so many felonies were rendered no longer capital, and that it may be fairly therefore assumed that it was thought by the Legislature that such privilege already belonged to all felonies, otherwise a provision would have been made for continuing it. And it certainly may be very reasonably conjectured, either that the probable opinion of the framers of these Acts was that there was a right in all cases of felony, whether capital or not, or that they did not mean to take it way by abolishing the benefit of clergy. If the former supposition be correct, it is some but not the most satisfactory evidence of the communis opinio, one of the sources of our knowledge of the common law; if the latter, it has no bearing on the present question, for though the Legislature may not have intended to take away the privilege, it certainly has done so, if there was no privilege at common law, except in capital felonies, because it has rendered them no longer capital.

We have, therefore, to determine what the common law upon this subject is, by the light of those authorities from which we usually derive the knowledge of it, the decisions of Courts, the dicta of judges, the authority of text-writers, analogies from admitted rules, and the prevailing opinion and practice:—First, the only decision of Courts are those in Ireland. In three cases, if not more, individual judges have decided, and we learn from the late Chief Justice Bushe, that one of the decisions was with the concurrent advice of the chief judges of Ireland (Report, 288), and all their decisions are in favour of the Crown, and have been constantly acted upon. There is none in any court in Ireland to the contrary, or in England, in any case, in which the point has been taken; and this appears to me to be a matter of the greatest weight and consequence, and the authority of these and all decisions ought to bind us, unless they are plainly founded in error. It is impossible, I think, to say that they are so decided as to shew that they are founded in error. Add to this, the practice in Ireland has been a long time established, to disallow peremptory challenges except in capital cases, though there is a circumstance which may somewhat weaken the value of this practice as evidence of the common law, namely, that it appears to have erroneously prevailed long before the abolition of the benefit of clergy, in respect to offences entitled to clergy, which were, strictly speaking, capital, unless clergy was prayed, and in point of law, at the time the jury were sworn, and the challenge made, were punishable with death. Still it shews the prevailing opinion, that the privilege did not belong to all felonies, and was confined to those which were capital, though it went too far in dealing with clergyable felonies as not being capital. On the other hand, in England, peremptory challenges have been allowed in all felonies since the 7 & 8 Geo. 4, the same as before; but the effect of this, as evidence of the common law, is greatly impaired, if not destroyed, by two circumstances. In the first place, the objection has never been taken on the part of the prosecution. A second circumstance is, that the practice prevails equally in misdemeanors, and in all civil cases, no one ever having heard of any impediment being interposed to the defendant or plaintiff in modern times making objections to any number of jurymen without cause, and they are always withdrawn; yet in actions there is unquestionably no right of peremptory challenge. It is properly observed by Mr Justice Crampton (in the report of the case in the Queen's Bench, Dublin), that there is considerable evidence that the English practice is founded on concession, not right, and that the Court should distinguish between a practice which is the result of strict right, and founded upon legal principles, and a practice which is a mere matter of indulgence and concession, growing out of that spirit of candour and fair dealing, and tenderness for persons undergoing the ordeal of public trial, by which the conduct of criminal trials in England is eminently characterized, as well on the side of the prosecution as of the defence; but he adds, that the rights of the prosecutor and the prisoner have been more jealously and rigidly watched in Ireland, and the Irish practice, therefore, affords a better test of the exact limits of the prisoner's right of peremptory challenge than the English practice does. Rex v. Gouch (9 Carr & P. 499), tried before me at Monmouth, has been cited as an authority for allowing the peremptory challenge in a non-capital felony. It is no authority whatever; it was only an instance of the practice to which I have adverted; for unquestionably the point was never taken nor considered by me.

It remains to consider the dicta of judges, the authority of text-writers on this subject, and the other sources from which we obtain the knowledge of the common law. One of the earliest traces of this right is in the Year Book, 9 Hen. 5, Trinity Term, p. 7. In appeal of murder it was argued, apparently by counsel, that the defendant should have his peremptory challenge of one who had already been sworn on the jury, which had been adjourned for want of jurors; the ground is, "that his life was in jeopardy," which shews what the principle was in which the right proceeded. The claim was disallowed there. It seems to have been allowed in 32 Hen. 6, c. 26, in favorem vitæ. Fortescue, De Laudibus, chapter 27, in the reign of Hen. 6, says, "In favour of life the accused may challenge thirty-five, and this peremptorily; who, then, in England, can be put to death unjustly for any crime?" Staunford, who writes in the early part of Elizabeth, p. 157 b, states, there is in felony a challenge to be allowed in favorem vitæ; and the same author, in the same treatise, states petty larceny to be no felony, and consequently the right seems by him to be confined to capital felonies. Limbard, in his Eirenarcha, written in James the First's time (554, b. 4, c. 14), puts it generally, as allowed in favour of life. Co. Litt. 157 b, is, that peremptory challenge is in treason or felony in favorem vitæ. But the text-writers not merely say that it is given in favorem vitæ, but that it is only allowed on issues which directly affect life; viz. not guilty to the treason or felony. Staunford, 158: "Nota, que cest peremptorie challenge nest destre prise (comme semble) mes ou le vie le prisoner est in jeopardie sur le trial;" so where misnomer is pleaded, or other collateral issue, it is not allowed; and this comme semble does not imply any doubt as to peremptory challenge applying only to cases where life is in danger, but as to its application to collateral issues. It is observed, in a note of Mr. Hargreave's (4 Co. Litt. 157 b, pl. 8), that Staunford himself thought there was a privilege of challenge peremptory on collateral issues (p. 163); but, on referring to that page, it may be doubted whether he means more than that in outlawry the outlaw may challenge for cause, and he gives as a reason, that although he cannot challenge one worse than himself, being an outlaw, yet as that is the issue to try, whether he is an outlaw or not, such an opinion of him ought to be suspended until he is tried. Co. Litt. 157 b, is to the contrary, "because the collateral issue by a mean concerneth his life;" but this point is set at rest by a judicial decision in Rex v. Okey (1 Lev. 61), and by Johnston and Ratcliffe's cases (Foster's Crown Law, 40). I cannot help thinking that a very strong authority to the right of peremptory challenge belongs only to that class of charges in which life is in jeopardy. In a book, written by Lord Chief Baron Boltons, afterwards Lord Chancellor of Ireland, called the Justice of the Peace for Ireland, published about 1638, cited in Mr. Joy's very learned book on Peremptory Challenge, in which all the authorities are collected, it is said, generally, "the common law hath, in favour of life, allowed unto the prisoner his peremptory challenge." In Wingate's Maxims (17th cent.) at Common Law, upon an indictment or appeal of treason or felony, the prisoner might, in favorem vitæ, challenge peremptory thirty-five. Sir John Hawks (9 State Trials, 796), says, "Generally it is a privilege given in favorem vitæ." In Trials per Pais (1702), peremptory challenge is not allowed, except where life comes in question. 600 (1766); 455 (1725). On the other hand, Finch (p. 414) lays it down generally in indictments and appeals of felony. The modern text-writers only repeat the ancient authorities in somewhat different language. I think the greater part of the more modern, as well as the more ancient authorities, are in favour of limiting the right to capital cases. These are then the dicta of judges. In Reading's case Lord Chief Justice North (7 St. Trials, 266), in a case of misdemeanor says, "You cannot challenge peremptorily, not being for your life;" and again, in page 266, "The challenge is only allowed in matters capital in favour of life." To him is opposed the dictum of Chief Justice Parker, in Macartney's case (2 Vin. Abr. 301). It was, however, a case of trial for the murder of the Duke of Hamilton; and the dictum may be reasonably construed as relating to a capital charge, and is not, therefore, of any weight. The rule of the common law is illustrated by the ancient practice of granting a tales in capital cases; it may be granted for a larger number than the first process, to prevent delays from peremptory challenges (Bac. Abr. Juries, C.; Brooks, Abr. 8vo. Tales, 8); the defendant had forty tales, because in appeal of murder, rape, or felony, where life is in jeopardy, there he shall have as many tales as he pleases, because he may challenge peremptorily thirty-five; but in actions between party and party it must always be under the first number. To the same effect is 10 Rept. 104 b (Dinbancu and Woodley's case). Still more light could be thrown upon the question, if indeed it could be decided what the rule was in ancient times as to petty larceny. There is some contradiction in the books whether this offence was a felony at common law, and some whether it was at any time punishable with death. (See Mr. Joy's treatise.) The result appears to be that it was a felony at common law, and not punishable with death. Was a peremptory challenge allowed in such a case or not? There is no decision on that subject one way or the other; and there are circumstances which lead to an inference both ways. First, it appears to be clear that the consequence of challenging more than the legal number in case of felony was at common law "the peine forte et dure;" but the peine forte et dure never was applicable to petty larceny. 2 Inst. 177, 2 Hale, ch. 399, 2 Hawk. P. C. 320, and Staunford, who wrote soon after, the 32 Hen. 8, states the challenge to be allowed in all felonies, in favorem vitæ, and treats petty larceny as no felony (246); says nothing of the right of challenge, and consequently it is inferred that it did not then exist in petty larceny. On the other hand, Mr. Maher, in his able argument at the bar, very properly urged, that it may be inferred that the same rights belonged to both grand and petty larceny, because if a person is indicted for the greater he may on the same indictment be found guilty of the lesser offence, as was decided Bromley's case (Hetly, p. 66). To this it may be answered, that the course pursued was beneficial to the prisoner, who had his peremptory challenges upon this form of indictment, and therefore it was no wrong to him to find him guilty of the lesser felony upon a charge in which he had none. But is is more correct to suppose that the Court considered the incidents as the same in all respects. The authorities, therefore, leave the question as to petty larceny not perfectly clear.

Another point was made the subject of argument at your lordships' bar. It was said that peremptory challenges were allowed in cases of misprision of treason at common law, and misprision was a misdemeanor, only not affecting life, and consequently that the privilege was not confined to cases affecting life. If it were true that in misprison of treason at common law there was this right, it might be explained on the supposition that it was an offence of great magnitude, near akin to the highest known to the law, especially in olden times, and so treated as an exception to the general rule, as it was by the judges in the Queen's Bench in Ireland. But the authorities collected in Mr. Joy's treatise render it extremely doubtful whether such privilege ever did exist. No old text-writer mentions it. Hawkins (P. C. 2, c. 43, s. 5) states, that he takes it to be agreed that a peremptory challenge was allowable at common law in all capital cases, and "also in misprision of treason." The authority of the last position is Lord Coke (3rd Inst. 27), who refers to Brookes's Abr. who again refers to the statute 23 Hen. 8, only. It is inferred that the statute would not have enacted that no peremptory challenge should thenceforth be admitted in treason or misprision of treason, unless it was already admissible therein in the opinion of the Legislature, and the doubt it is a reasonable though not conclusive inference. It is remarkable, however, that no trace of such a right should be found in the older authorities; and if it had existed, it is to have been expected that 1 & 2 Phil. & Mary, c. 10 would have restored the course of trial of misprision of [illegible] as well as of treason, to the rules of common law, which it certainly does not. It is also very [illegible] that the corresponding Irish statute of 10 & 11 Chas. 1, c. 9, which limits peremptory challenge in Ireland in cases of treason, does not mention misprision of treason, which affords a strong argument, that in Ireland, at least, the right of challenge did not exist in cases of misprision of treason, or it certainly would have been limited. It is said, however, that it should be held that the right of challenge exists only in capital felonies at common law, the same rule would apply to pleading over in charges of felony after pleading a special plea. This right is, according to Lord Hale, 2 P. C. 33, in favorem vitæ (Rex v. Taylor, 3 B. & C. 513), and Hale says he shall not lose his life for mis-pleading. (1 Hale, 257.) I am quite prepared to say that this consequence would follow, but it does not appear to me to weaken the force of the argument. Upon the whole, therefore, I think that the statutes restricting the right of challenge (not giving it) contain negative words only, without any affirmative implication, and leave the common law as it stood; and the common law, upon the weight of authority, is, that there is a right of challenge in all capital cases only. The framers of that Act, I have no doubt, never intended to take away the right, by abolishing the benefit of clergy. The result, therefore, is one which they never contemplated: but it nevertheless is the result, if the position is correct, that by the common law the right belongs only to capital cases. It is the duty of judges not to supply the defects of the Legislature by providing a remedy, but simply to construe the provisions of the statute they have enacted; and I cannot find words to give this privilege in the statute as granted, if the effect of making the offence no longer capital was to take it away.

POLLOCK, C. B. also gave his opinion that the Court ought to have allowed the peremptory challenge.

TINDAL, C. J.—My lords, the conclusion at which I have arrived, is, that the Court below ought to have allowed the peremptory challenge on the part of the prisoner; and, my lords, the reason of such conclusion is shortly this, that it is certain that A B would by the common law have been entitled to his peremptory challenge if he had been arraigned upon the very same felony before the passing of 1 Vict. c. 85; but it is not equally certain that such peremptory challenge has been taken from him by the necessary operation of that statute. And, if the question, whether his right to the peremptory challenge has or has not been taken away, remains open to any doubt, it appears to me, that, in accordance with the general principles, the decision of such question is to be given in favour of the prisoner. But I think further, that the question does not remain in doubt. It is true, that the ancient authorities, at least the far greater number of them, describe the right of peremptory challenge to be a right allowed in favorem vitæ. (Staundeforde, P. C. 158 a; Lambard's Justice of Peace, fo. 546; Co. Inst. 150 b; Doct. & Stud. c. 8; Fortes. de Laud. c. 27; Ld. Hale, 2 H. P. C. 266.) Finch, however, in his "Law," p. 414, and many other text-writers, state the rule generally as applicable to the case of all indictments and appeals of felony, without any reference to the punishment annexed to that offence. But perhaps this apparent diversity is not of much real importance; for at common law all felonies, certainly all but petty larceny, were followed by capital punishment; and as to petty larceny the books differ whether it is felony or not. Staundeforde in his P. C. 127 b, 24 b, expressly affirming it not to be felony, whilst Lord Hale, in 1 H. P. C. 530, affirms that it is. But at any rate no ancient authority shews that peremptory challenges were not allowed even on the trial for that offence; so that it may be safely laid down that at common law all felonies, properly so called, were capital, and that peremptory challenges were allowed on the trial of all such felonies; in other words, that the right to a peremptory challenge was in all cases an incident to a trial for felony. It is equally true that the challenge was granted in favorem vitæ, and that it was an incident to felony. But still do the words "that it was granted in favorem vitæ" mean that it was incident to the trial for felony only so long as the punishment for felony continued to be capital, and no longer; or are they only a mere description of the probable cause and origin of this challenge? It would be most unsafe to hold that because the capital punishment has been taken away by a subsequent statute, the offence still remaining a felony, the right to the challenge has been also abolished. In another instance, where the same words have been used, the same conclusion would be obviously wrong. In the case of Appeals, 4 Co. 48 a, "It was resolved by the Lord Wray, Sir F. Gawdry, Clench, and Fenner, judges, that the reason of autrefois acquit was, because the maxim of common law is, that the life of a man shall not be twice put in jeopardy for the same offence; and that is the reason and cause that autrefois acquitted or convicted of the same offence is a good plea;" and yet it is manifest this maxim [illegible] by way of example only, for the rule, beyond all doubt, extends equally to misdemeanors as to capital cases. And after all, who is to say that the [illegible] which existed in favorem vitæ would not [illegible] in the same extent in favour of the party [illegible] transportation for life, had it been known as a punishment. It is further argued that the right could not have been originally so confined, as it was allowed in the case of misprision of treason; and I think that 33 Hen. 8, c. 23, does by necessary implication admit that the offender had the right to the peremptory challenge in the case of misprision of high treason before the passing of that Act. The same rule is laid down in general terms by Hawkins, book 2, c. 43, s. 5. The right to challenge peremptorily has been uniformly acted on, in England, both in felonies clergyable and not clergyable, without any distinction between them, down to the 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 28, Eng. (9 Geo. 4, c. 54, Ir.), which abolished the allowance of clergy. Where the offender has persisted in challenging a greater number than twenty in the case of a clergyable felony, the law was, that he subjected himself to the same punishment as if found guilty upon verdict or confession. Where statutes have been passed taking away the benefit of clergy, there is not unfrequently an express provision, that if the offender in case of felony "do challenge peremptorily above the number of twenty persons, he shall not have the benefit of clergy." Such is the case in 4 & 5 Phil. & M. c. 4. The law thus treating the right to challenge peremptorily, without any distinction whether the felony be clergyable or not.

But the strongest ground for the conclusion that the right to the peremptory challenge still exists, is the inference to be drawn from the language and frame of 22 Hen. 8, c. 14 (made perpetual by the 32 Hen. 8, c. 3), and 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 28, abolishing the benefit of clergy. Before the former Act, wherever a peremptory challenge was allowed, the prisoner might challenge as many as he thought fit under the number of three full juries, that is, not more than thirty-five; and the words, "that no person arraigned for any petit treason, murder, or felony, shall be admitted to any peremptory challenge above the number of twenty," amount to a legislative recognition, affirmatively, that the offender has the right to challenge to the number of twenty in all cases of petit treason, murder, or felony. Then follows 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 28 (English), 9 Geo. 4, c. 54 (Irish), which by section 6 abolishes benefit of clergy, and by section 7 expressly enacts, "that no person convicted of felony shall suffer death, unless it be for some felony which was excluded from the benefit of clergy before the first day of the present session of Parliament, or which hath been or shall be made punishable with death by some statute passed after that day." And it appears scarcely conceivable, that when the Legislature had introduced so sweeping an alteration in the consequences of felony, as in effect to render all felonies, within a very limited exception indeed, not capital, that the same statute should, in the same breath, enact, "that if any person indicted for any treason, felony, or piracy shall challenge peremptorily a greater number of the men returned to be of the jury than such person is entitled by law so to challenge, in every of the said cases every such peremptory challenge beyond the number allowed by law shall be entirely disregarded" (sec. 3), unless the Legislature had intended this enactment to apply to felonies with their then present punishment as altered by that statute. The statute of George IV. brings down the enactment of 22 Hen. 8 to the time at which the statute itself is speaking; in effect it says, that now, at the time of passing this Act, every person charged with the commission of any felony shall be entitled to challenge peremptorily to the number of twenty; and there appears no legal ground of construction upon which the general expression of "any felony" in the third section can be held not to comprise the felonies included in section 7, that is, felonies from which the benefit of clergy has been taken away. The distinction between felonies capital and not capital was then for the first time created; and it would not be too much to presume, that if the Legislature had intended that the privilege formerly belonging to all felonies should thenceforth be restrained to capital felonies only, it would have used the expression of "any capital felony," instead of the general expression of "any felony." My lords, the Crown rest their argument on an implication from 1 Vict. c. 85, s. 3, that inasmuch as the punishment of death has been directly taken away by the statute of 7 & 8 Geo. 4, which before was indirectly taken away by the allowance of clergy, so, by implication, the right of peremptory challenge has been also abolished with the capital punishment. But it appears to me that such an implication cannot be resorted to in the case of a privilege beneficial to a prisoner, and enjoyed by him in practice, if not in strict right, for centuries, unless such implication be unavoidable to give effect to the statute. No such necessity appears to exist, and therefore I humbly offer as my opinion, that the peremptory challenge tendered in this case ought to have been allowed.

The judgment was subsequently reversed, and venire de novo ordered.

Equity Courts.

VICE-CHANCELLOR OF ENGLAND'S COURT.

Wednesday, May 22.

STRATFORD v. LEWIS.

Practice—Injunction—Insufficient answer—Amendment of bill—Common injunction extended to stay trial.

The plaintiff since obtaining the common injunction, had obtained an order for leave to amend his bill, and that the defendant should answer exceptions and amendments together (the defendant having filed an insufficient answer): a motion to extend the common injunction to stay trial granted notwithstanding; and although the amendments were not yet filed.

It appeared that the defendant in the suit had commenced an action at law against the plaintiff upon certain bills of exchange, and the plaintiff, on the 17th of April last, filed his bill, praying that the said bills of exchange might be declared void, and be delivered up to the plaintiff to be cancelled, and that in the meantime the defendant might be restrained by an order of the Court from negotiating the same, and that the defendant might be restrained from proceeding in his said action at law.

The injunction to restrain the defendant from negotiating the bills of exchange was granted on the 18th April, and the defendant filed his answer to the plaintiff's bill on the 27th of the same month, and served a notice of motion for dissolving the injunction for the 2nd of May, which motion had not yet been made. On the 1st of May the plaintiff filed his exceptions to the defendant's answer for insufficiency; these exceptions were allowed by the Master on the 6th of that same month; and on that day the plaintiff obtained an order for leave to amend, and that the defendant might answer the exceptions and amendments together, the plaintiff undertaking to amend in three weeks from the date of the order. The amendments had not yet been filed, but on the 8th of May the plaintiff obtained the common injunction to restrain the defendant from proceeding in his action at law.

Bethel and Hallett, on behalf of the plaintiff, now moved to extend the common injunction to stay trial upon the usual affidavit made by the plaintiff that he could not safely go to trial without the defendant's answer, and that he believed the answer would contain a discovery material to his defence.

K. S. Parker and Wright, on the other side, contended that the plaintiff could not extend the common injunction to stay trial after having obtained an order for liberty to amend, and that the defendant should answer the amendments and exceptions together: that in a precisely similar case, the late Lord Chancellor Cottenham, when Master of the Rolls, expressed himself as follows, viz.:—"The injunction to stay trial grows out of the common injunction; and as the plaintiff, by amending his bill, admits that as it stood originally he had not a case for the injunction, I do not think that by amending after answer, he can put himself in a better situation. The case of Brown v. Keina (3 You. & Ger. 389) seems expressly in point." (Mellor v. Cresswell, 2 My. & K. 616.)

Bethel.—In Newland's Chancery Practice, vol. 1, 3rd edit. p. 356, the case of Mostin v. Mortlock is mentioned. The author says: "After the plaintiff has obtained the above order to amend (i. e. for the defendant to answer the exceptions and amendments together), he may obtain an order to extend the common injunction which had before issued to stay trial until the defendant puts in a sufficient answer, although the amendments were put upon the record on the very day when the motion was to have been made, and though the extended injunction will necessarily stay trial until both the exceptions and amendments are answered."

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—Mr. Newland's note of the case alluded to in his Practice, agrees with Reg. Lib. 1815, B. fol. 1584; but the only difficulty I have to contend with in the present case is this, viz. that the bill has not yet been amended.

Bethel.—This point has already been considered by your Honour in the case of Simes v. Duff (8 Sim. 270). We are entitled to have the answer, and we therefore come here to have that which is founded upon the absence of the answer. According to the rules of the court, we have a right to call upon the defendant to answer the exceptions and amendments together, and we are entitled to three weeks to amend. It is competent for the defendant to apply to the Court by motion for the purpose of compelling us to amend within a certain number of days, if he objects to remain bound during the three weeks. He, however, has not done so; therefore we have a clear right to amend our bill, and in consequence of the defendant's answer being reported insufficient, to have an answer to the amendments and exceptions at the same time. Moreover, is not the plaintiff entitled to avail himself of the position in which the defendant has placed himself, as a wrong-doer, to extend the common injunction to stay trial? In Mostyn v. Mortlock, Lord Eldon conceived that the circumstance of the amendments having been filed was no objection to the motion, as the right to extend the common injunction existed by reason of the position of the parties.

The Vice-Chancellor.—I certainly do not see the conclusion, that because a plaintiff admits by amending his bill, that he had not originally a sufficient case, that, therefore, by his amendment he cannot have a sufficient one; but the present case appears to me to be governed by this circumstance, that the order which the plaintiff obtained on the 6th of May entitles him to call upon the defendant to answer the exceptions and amendments together. This order affords a limit to the time during which the plaintiff is at liberty to amend, and it is quite immaterial upon what day he amends, provided he does so before expiration of the time allowed by the order.

Motion granted.

VICE-CHANCELLOR KNIGHT BRUCE'S COURT.

Meinertzhagen v. Davis.

Trustees, appointment of—Foreigners.

An American citizen, resident in England, married an English lady, and her property "was assigned to trustees upon trusts for the benefit of herself and her children," and a power was contained in the settlement for investment of the property in American funds or realty. The husband and wife remove to America, and the property is invested in American funds, and three new trustees, who are American citizens, are appointed:—Held, that the appointment of new trustees was valid.

Semble, That an appointment of foreigners as trustees under a power, where the property and the parties interested were English, would be improper.

Semble, That the original number of trustees should be adhered to in any new appointment of trustees.

This case, which is reported upon one point ante, vol. ii. p. 95, again came on to be heard, when objections were raised by Swanston and Lee, on behalf of the defendants Davis, as to the validity of the appointment of the new trustees, as the original number was not kept, and because the new trustees were American citizens resident in America; and, 2ndly, as to the propriety of allowing the fund to be transferred out of the jurisdiction. They cited Attorney-General v. College of William and Mary in Virginia (1 Ves. 243); and Lewin on Trusts, p. 465.

Wigram and Palmer, for the plaintiffs.

Leach, for the infant defendants.

The Vice-Chancellor.—The first question is, whether, immediately before the time when the agreement to indemnify was made, the Messrs. Davis were under any liability by reason of acts in which they participated or which they allowed. That was the only question opened by the plaintiff, and I did not conceive that there was any other question in the cause. That depends upon the question whether it is proper to alter the number of the trustees originally appointed. It is generally proper to adhere to the same number, and it is a rule attended with convenience. But, in the abstract, there is nothing materially inconvenient or improper in the appointment of a different number. If, however, the power is so worded as to contemplate the appointment of another number of trustees than those appointed by the original deed, there is no difficulty. I have already observed that there are words in this power which appear to shew that the parties contemplated the appointment of more than two trustees, and, therefore, I think that no liability arose on that ground. The next objection is one of a more formidable nature, viz. that the new trustees are American citizens. Without deciding the question, I will assume that where there is a settlement made in England upon a marriage of English persons, and then extending only to English persons, it would be imprudent and improper to appoint as trustees foreigners, or English persons resident abroad. The present is a case of mere personalty, belonging to an English lady, who marries a Virginian resident in England, the domicile and origin shewn to be Virginian. The mere fact of staying at any place does not change the domicile of origin. The instant he marries, the domicile of his wife becomes Virginian. This settlement then having been made under circumstances which rendered it probable that the parties might reside in Virginia, a provision is made for investment of the property in funds in America. This provision is general, not confined to the United States. It is quite plain, therefore, that the whole fund might be withdrawn from the jurisdiction of the Court, leaving only persons answerable, and if there were only persons answerable, they had but to shew that they had dealt with the fund according to the settlement, and they would be free from liability. All these events might reasonably and properly have occurred. What then? The parties return to Virginia; the two trustees resident in this country, who are connected with the wife, desire to retire; they retire and appoint three Virginian gentlemen trustees, relations of the husband, English in language as the husband, and English in origin as the husband, and I am called on to say that the appointment of three respectable persons, English in language and origin, is of necessity an improper appointment. I am of opinion that, in this case, it was a proper and justifiable course.

Burgess v. Burgess.

Executors, legacies to—Revocation.

Where there was a bequest to each of a testator's executors as a mark of respect for them, and, by a codicil, their appointment as executors was revoked, it was held, that they were nevertheless entitled to their legacies.

Dr. Burgess, by his will, gave to each of his trustees the sum of 100*l*. in the following terms:—"to each of my trustees, Bright, Marriott, and Burgess, 100*l*. as a mark of my respect for them." The same persons were appointed executors. By a codicil, the appointment of these persons as trustees and executors was revoked, and three others were appointed, to each of whom a sum of 100*l*. was given in terms similar to those used in the will as to the former executors. A question was raised in the suit, whether Messrs. Bright, Marriott, and Burgess were entitled to the legacies.

The case of Read v. Devaynes (3 Bro. C. C. 95) was cited.

Simpkinson, Cooper, Russell, Wigram, [illegible], Toller, H. Clarke, and Boyle, for the several parties.

The Vice-Chancellor said, that these gentlemen were entitled to the legacies notwithstanding their appointment as trustees and executors had been revoked. Read v. Devaynes would probably, at the present day, be decided differently than it had been.

Barker v. Ford.

Practice—Costs. 41st Order of August 1841.

Where a defendant to an original bill filed a cross bill of discovery, but before an answer was put in to the cross bill the original suit was dismissed, the defendant to the cross bill was held to be entitled to his costs as under the old practice, the case not being within the 41st Order of August 1841.

In this case there was an orginal cause, and the defendant filed a cross bill of discovery against the plaintiff. Before an answer to the cross bill had been put in, the original bill was dismissed, and the defendant in the original suit gave notice to the plaintiff that he should not require an answer to the cross bill of discovery.

Swanston and Montague, on behalf of the plaintiff in the original suit, now moved that the cross bill might be dismissed with costs. This was not a case coming within the 41st Order of August, 1841, as the original cause would never be heard, and therefore the old practice must be adopted. (Westfield v. Skipwith, 1 Ph. 277.)

Russell and Winstanley, contrà.

The Vice-Chancellor (without hearing a reply)— Take your order.

Thomson v. Thomson.

Mortmain Act—Shares in Gas Company.

Where a testator gave certain shares in a Gas Company, part of whose capital stock consisted of lands held for the purposes of the company, the Court held that the bequest was not void under the Mortmain Act.

Simon Gray, by his will, dated the 21st of February, 1827, gave the residue of his property to trustees for certain charitable purposes. Part of this property consisted of shares in the Gas-light and Coke Company, which was established by the 50th Geo. 3, c. 163, and regulated by several subsequent Acts of Parliament. By these Acts the company was made a corporation, for the purpose of manufacturing and selling inflammable air, &c. and they had the power to purchase lands, to the extent of ten acres, for the purposes of the corporation. In the joint stock of the corporation, which consisted, amongst other things, of these lands, the shareholders had an interest. The Master, to whom an inquiry had been referred with regard to the testator's estate, &c., had reported that these shares were purely personal estate. To this report some of the defendants excepted, it being urged by them that the bequest for charitable purposes was as to these shares void.

Russell and Glass, for the exceptions.

Simpkinson, Swanston, Wigram, Malins, Hubback, Austen, Bagshaw, and Welford, for parties in the same interest.

H. Twiss and Wray, for the Attorney-General.

The Vice-Chancellor.—This question relates to shares in a trading corporation, constituted and regulated by various Acts of Parliament, one of which makes the corporation perpetual, and by one or more of which the acquisition of land in fee-simple is authorised. The object is to produce inflammable air, &c. and to sell and dispose of it, [illegible] a power to make contracts for lighting the streets [illegible] which they may or may not exercise; and whether they exercise this power or not, it [illegible] surely a trading corporation. The joint stock to be used in establishing and carrying on the undertaking is to be subscribed in shares of 50*l*. each; and it is enacted, that these shares shall be deemed personal estate, and not of the nature of real estate. The shares thus constituted, then, are shares of a joint stock, to be raised for trading purposes, and the profits of which are to be divided among the proprietors. The shares can only be connected with land, as the business is carried on in connection with the earth, as all business to a greater or less extent must be, and also with real property to be purchased by the corporation. The landed property is held by the corporation as part of the general stock, which is to produce certain profits of trade which, when produced, are to be divided. Speaking untechnically, this interest would be as foreign to the idea of real property as possible. Now, it is possible that, by an excessively strict and far-fetched interpretation of the words of the Mortmain Act, this interest might be held to be within them. The question, however, is, whether upon a just and rational comparison of the language of the Act with the intention to be collected from the whole Act or otherwise, the words are properly applicable to a case of this description. I am of opinion that they are not. Without saying that these interests may be within the term—which I can scarcely understand—"pure personalty," I am of opinion that they do not fall within the Mortmain Act according to a just interpretation of that Act.

Bankrupt and Insolvent Courts.

(Before Mr. Commissioner Fane.)

Monday, Sept. 9.

Re Alger, an Insolvent Debtor.

Rules of evidence—Fraud under 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96, s. 24.

This insolvent came before the commissioner on his interim order, and was opposed by Messrs. Watson and Co. (with whom he had dealt for nearly twelve months) on the ground that he had ordered goods on the 4th of May last, and for which he was to pay ready money, but when the goods were delivered, the insolvent was unable to do so. Insolvent subsequently ordered three other parcels of goods, and paid for them, leaving the 3*l*. 5s. yet unpaid. A statement was made by the opposing creditor of what his traveller informed him as to a conversation between the said traveller and insolvent about ready-money dealing, when the attorney,

Buchanan, of Basinghall-st. who supported the insolvent), objected to the evidence, as the traveller was not present in court to be subjected to cross-examination, and who was the only person who could give the real facts as to the contract. This

Mr. Commissioner Fane overruled, saying it was not necessary that the strict rules of evidence should be observed in this court.

Buchanan addressed the Court on the whole case, and again pressed the great importance of the rules of evidence being acted up to, and to reject all hearsay evidence, as in other courts, but was stopped by

The Court, who adjudged that the debt was contracted by fraud, and therefore under the 24th sec. 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96, declined to name a day for the final order, and refused to extend the protection.

Ecclesiastical Courts.

PREROGATIVE COURT.

Coventry v. Williams.

It is incumbent on a party setting up a paper as testamentary, to shew by the contents of the paper itself, or by extrinsic evidence, that it is of that nature.

If the paper purports of itself to be testamentary, the party who opposes its admission to probate must, in order to get rid of it, shew that it was not made animo testandi.

If the purport be equivocal, the party setting it up must shew that it was made animo testandi.

A paper not describing itself as codicillary to the will of the testator, nor directing any thing to be done, but only expressive of the writer's intention "immediately to order" his solicitor "to make a (certain) codicil," is not, upon the face of the instrument itself, of a testamentary nature; and in the present case, the extrinsic evidence with regard to it fails to shew that the deceased intended it to operate as a codicil.

The delivery of such a paper to the party named therein is not sufficient to supply the deficiency of its internal character.

A suit respecting the validity of certain codicils to the will of George William, [illegible] Earl of Coventry, who died on the [illegible] of May, [illegible].

The deceased, during the latter years of his life, was admitted to [illegible] mind; but he left behind [illegible] thereto, alleged to have [illegible] to, and consequently to be [illegible] of administration [illegible] were, in the month of July 1843, granted to the Hon. Mr. Coventry, a brother of the testator. In addition to these, several other papers were propounded by the various legatees named therein. Some, if not all of them, were opposed by the administrator to whom probate of the will and first codicil had been granted, on different grounds. Their validity was argued and decided by the Court during the course of last Hilary Term (2 Law T.). Amongst them the following was propounded as a codicil to the will of the deceased by a Mrs. Chase, an actress, the sole legatee named therein:—

"Severn Bank, Worcester, Nov. 18, 1840.

"In consequence of a late introduction to Mrs. Chase, finding her talents and virtues unrepaid, either by her profession (to which she is an ornament), or by her husband, who since that acquaintance has been proved to be already married, I have determined to offer her, as a tribute to her talents and virtues, the following small pittance, that poverty may never overtake her. I shall immediately order Mr. Morland, who has made my will, to make the following codicil to it:—That whereas, in consideration of my sincere affection for her irreproachable character and her other virtues, she shall enjoy from me the small but welcome allowance of fifty pounds per annum, to be paid by Messrs. Coutts and Co. bankers, Strand, half-yearly, quarterly, or annually, as she shall will it. And after her death (which I cannot contemplate without feelings of the deepest regret), to her son. Given under my hand and seal, this 18th of November, 1840.

"Coventry."

"Witness,—Thomas Marchant,
"Richard Chambers, M.D."

Sir J. Dodson, Q.A. and R. Phillimore, opposed the validity of the paper, on the ground that it was not of a testamentary character. There was nothing on the face of the instrument from which its codicillary nature could be inferred, and the evidence of the attesting witnesses did not shew that the deceased had that object in view when he executed it. They cited The King's Proctor v. Daines (3 Hagg. 218) and Griffin v. Ferard (1 Cur. 98).

Addams, in support of the paper, submitted that the paper was a provisional codicil intended to operate if the deceased did not make one of a more formal character. He had not done so, and the Court was bound to carry his obvious intentions into effect by granting probate to the present paper.

Sir H. Jenner Fust, having taken time to consider, now pronounced judgment.—The question to be determined in this case relates to a paper, dated the 18th of November, 1840, propounded as a codicil to the will of the late Earl of Coventry, by a Mrs. Chase, the sole legatee named therein. The contents of this paper are as follows (vide supra). The question I have now to decide is, what is the legal character of this paper. Now, upon the face of it, this paper does not purport to be testamentary; it does not purport to be the instrument under which this lady is to take an annuity of 50*l.*; it does not speak of an act done, but of an act to be done, and that not by the deceased but by a Mr. Morland, who, it appears, had drawn the deceased's will. Now, I apprehend it to be incumbent upon a party setting up a paper as testamentary to shew, by the contents of the paper itself or by extrinsic evidence, that it is of that character and nature; that by the very identical paper the party deceased has given, or intended to give, or supposed himself to have given, the particular legacy or bounty claimed. If the paper purports of itself to be testamentary, the party who opposes its admission to probate must, in order to get rid of it, shew to the Court that it was not made animo testandi. I am clearly of opinion that this paper is not testamentary in itself; it is only to have operation and effect by the instrumentality of some other document; the deceased is to give orders to Mr. Morland to make that which is to be the effective instrument. I am the more inclined to this opinion by this circumstance: the codicil of 1840 commences in these words: "This is another codicil to my will;" a special and direct declaration that that very instrument is a codicil to his will. This is also the expression made use of in another paper, dated in the year 1836, "This is a codicil to my will." Those two papers are, therefore, both very differently described from that now under consideration, which purports not to be an act done at the moment, but indicates an intention to give instructions to a solicitor to prepare a codicil to such and such effect. Upon the face of this instrument there is nothing testamentary. Then, is there any extrinsic evidence that the deceased did intend this paper to operate as a codicil? I can find none; indeed, there is one striking circumstance to the contrary appearing on the evidence of the attesting witnesses, namely, neither of them, at the time of attesting, had any notion that they were witnessing a codicil. The whole evidence of Marchant shews that at the time of [illegible] this paper, he did not know it was a codicil; [illegible] nearly the commencement of his deposition. [illegible] interrogatory, "I had no [illegible] of the contents or purport of the said [illegible] was a codicil." The evidence does not supply what is [illegible] on the face of the paper itself. The other witness, Dr. Chambers says, in his examination in chief, that he was in attendance on Mrs. Chase, then staying at Lord Coventry's house; that agreeably to a request from his lordship, he called at the house and found Mrs. Chase and his lordship sitting in the dining-room; that after conversing with them for some time, Lord Coventry said, speaking to Mrs. Chase, "As Chambers is here, I may as well get him to sign this paper;" and he thereupon got up and went to his writing-table, and took from a drawer a paper and read its contents. The purport of it was to bequeath —"bequeath" is the expression the witness uses— an annuity of 50*l.* to Mrs. Chase. He says, "I further recollect that his lordship said the annuity was to be continued to her little boy." Then he goes on to state that Marchant was called in, the deceased having signed the paper before Marchant came into the room; and then he says, "Upon Marchant coming in, Lord Coventry desired him to sign his name to the paper, which Marchant did in the presence of Lord Coventry and me, Mrs. Chase being also present. Marchant having signed it, withdrew. My present belief is, that I did not sign the paper until after Marchant had left the room, because I have some recollection of having mentioned to Marchant, as I was leaving the house, that I also had signed the paper." In answer to the first additional interrogatory, the same witness says, "Whilst Lord Coventry was in the act of signing his name to the codicil in question, he mentioned to me the purport of its contents." In answer to the second interrogatory, he states the manner in which the paper was executed and attested. To the third he says, "I have before stated the manner in which I was asked to witness the said codicil; my signing was, in part, at my own suggestion, on account of Lord Coventry having, in the first instance, said that he might as well sign the codicil whilst I was there. I have no recollection of Lord Coventry having, in exact terms, called the paper in question a codicil to his will; he did not ask me to sign it as being a codicil; I did not (being unacquainted with the legal operation of similar papers) know that such paper would take effect as a codicil to his will. I had no doubt of the validity of the paper to effect whatever might be thereby intended by Lord Coventry." In answer to the twelfth interrogatory, "It was the impression on my mind at the time of signing and witnessing the said paper, that it was not more than a memorandum or security to Mrs. Chase that his lordship would make her the allowance therein mentioned. I considered the annuity mentioned was already in course of payment, and not postponed until his lordship's death. After I had witnessed the paper, Lord Coventry handed it to Mrs. Chase, saying "That is a sufficient security for you," and she then folded it up and placed it in her bosom. Lord Coventry also said to Mrs. Chase, "I will speak to Morland about it." Here, then, is the same intention deposed to as is manifested on the paper itself, namely, that the deceased was to speak to Morland respecting it. Dr. Chambers says to the same interrogatory, "Had I supposed that my signature to the said paper would have given it validity as a codicil, I should not for a moment have hesitated to sign it on being requested by Lord Coventry to do so." This is the evidence of the two witnesses, the only persons present at this transaction. They cannot say that the deceased signed this paper as a codicil to his will; the impression on the mind of Dr. Chambers is that it was a mere security to Mrs. Chase that Lord Coventry would make such a codicil —that he would speak to Morland about it. There is nothing, as it appears to me, to supply the deficiency in the character of the paper; the evidence in that respect decidedly fails. Then the question arises whether the delivery of this paper to Mrs. Chase is sufficient to supply what is wanting in its internal character; I am of opinion it is not. I do not think it was, as suggested in argument, a provisional paper intended to operate in case the deceased did not make one of a more formal nature. It has been said that the impression of the witnesses as to its character could not affect the nature of the paper, and that it may, notwithstanding their impression, be a codicil. Undoubtedly it may, but where there is no internal evidence from the paper itself, that it was intended to be testamentary, it is essential that the extrinsic evidence should supply that which is necessary to give it a testamentary character. I must reject this paper.

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.

AUGUST SESSIONS.

Monday, Aug. 19.

Rex. v. Bunyan and Morgan.

Indictment for indecently exposing the person. What is sufficient evidence of the offence having been committed in public.

The prisoners were indicted at common law for indecently exposing their persons; and the first count of the indictment set out that they, on the day of , in the parish of , unlawfully and wickedly did meet together, and were in a certain room in the dwelling-house of one W. B. with the intent and for the purpose of committing and perpetrating with each other divers unnatural and sodomitical acts and practices, and that defendants did in the sight and view of each other, and also in the sight and view of one C. S. and divers other liege subjects, expose their naked private parts, and did put and place their hands upon and against their naked private parts, and divers lewd and beastly acts then and there did, &c.

The 2nd count—That the defendants did unlawfully lay their hands on each other, with intent to excite and stir up in each other filthy, lewd, beastly, and unnatural lusts and desires, and to excite each other to the commission of divers unnatural acts and practices, and that the said G. Bunyan did unlawfully and wickedly expose his private parts to the sight and view of the said W. Morgan, and that the said W. Morgan did put and place his hands upon and take hold of the naked private parts of the said G. Bunyan, and other filthy and unnatural acts then and there did, &c.

The evidence was to the effect that the two prisoners had gone into the room in question, which was the parlour of a public house, and that while there they committed the acts mentioned in the indictment. A female servant, it appeared, had witnessed their conduct through the window of another room, which was separated from the parlour by a passage. She immediately went to procure assistance, and, in consequence of her representations, a policeman and another witness came to the spot, and they also saw sufficient to constitute the crime. The servant herself was, however, not called, and, of course, her representations to the policeman could not be received.

Upon this state of facts,

Prendergast, for the prisoners, submitted that since publicity constituted the very essence of this offence at common law, it should be proved for the purposes of a conviction, that the parties had committed these acts in a public place, such that the natural consequence would be that they would be seen by others, and that, in fact, they were seen by others casually, and not by contrivance.

The Recorder.—Must it not be inferred, that what these parties did was obvious to the servant girl at least, and that it was an annoyance to those in the house?

Prendergast.—Nothing of the kind is proved. We have merely the evidence of those who came for the express purpose of seeing what was going forward, and surely it cannot be contended that these acts were an annoyance and injury to them, within the meaning of the law, when they intentionally sought the exhibition of which they complain. The prisoners here sought privacy, and for all that appears in evidence, they might have obtained it but for the arrangement between other parties. How can it be said that the prisoners have done this publicly, when, but for the acts of others, of which acts we are legally ignorant, the witnesses who are to prove the publicity would have known nothing of the matter? Suppose that two persons were to shut themselves up in a room and commit the acts here alleged, they surely could not be said to have wilfully exposed their persons in public, and yet they might be seen through a hole in the wall, which had been made for the express purpose of detecting them. This shews that it is not the mere possibility of their practices being witnessed by others that will constitute a sufficient publicity. The question is, did the parties commit the acts, reckless of the probability of their being overlooked? Then, as to the second count, it cannot be supported, for there is no allegation of publicity, and it has never yet been held that an exposure by one party to the other, both being culpable, is sufficient to create an offence at common law.

The Recorder.—As to your argument respecting the second count, I need not decide the question, because it is patent on the face of the record, and you may have your writ of error. With regard to the first count, I shall leave it to the jury to say whether this was a place in which such practices occurring, they were likely to be witnessed by others. It cannot be necessary to prove that the parties intended that the public should detect them; they would always seek as much privacy as they could conveniently obtain; but was this such a situation that there was no reasonable probability of their being so discovered? It is true that the servant maid is not called; but if there be any thing in the objection that the witnesses we have heard to-day went to the room expressly to look upon the disgusting acts they have detailed, still it must be a question for the jury, and one which they are fully entitled to decide, whether the reason of the witnesses being summoned to the house could be any other than that the girl herself had seen what they saw subsequently. In any view of the case, therefore, I think there is ample evidence to go to the jury.

The case was accordingly so left, and the prisoners were convicted.

THE LEGISLATOR.

Summary.

THE session having closed, there is nothing to record under this head. The publication of the new statutes proceeds rapidly, and we print to-day Mr. Fitzroy Kelly's proposed Bill for establishing "Appeal in Criminal Cases." The proposed Consolidation Bills relating to future railways and public improvements, &c. will appear in due course.

4. The mode of serving the rule nisi if granted. The mode of proceeding if the rule be refused.—And be it enacted, That whenever upon such motion as aforesaid a rule nisi shall be granted, the defendant shall cause an office-copy of such rule nisi to be served upon the prosecutor or his attorney, and upon her Majesty's Attorney-General; and whenever upon any such motion as aforesaid any rule absolute shall be made, the defendant shall cause an office-copy of such rule to be served upon the sheriff or under-sheriff of the county in which such defendant shall have been tried, and on the officer in whose custody the indictment on which such defendant shall have been tried shall be; and, in case such defendant shall be in custody there, also upon the gaoler or other officer in whose custody such defendant shall happen to be; and whenever any such motion shall be refused, or any verdict of guilty shall be affirmed, the prosecutor, or the Attorney-General in case the prosecutor be dead or cannot be found, shall cause an office-copy of the rule to be served upon the sheriff or under-sheriff, and other officer hereinbefore mentioned; and every such officer in whose custody such indictment as aforesaid shall be, shall, upon being served with any such office-copy of any such rule as aforesaid, indorse on the back of such indictment, a true and correct copy thereof, and shall file such copy of such rule with the said indictment; and every such rule, when so indorsed on the said indictment, shall have the force and effect of a judgment: provided always, that in case it shall be made to appear upon affidavit to the Court that shall have granted any such rule nisi as aforesaid, that the prosecutor is dead, or cannot be found, and that the Attorney-General has had reasonable notice in writing thereof, it shall and may be lawful for such Court to hear and determine such motion in like manner as if the prosecutor had been duly served with an office-copy of such rule nisi as aforesaid.

6. Proceedings when the Court refuses the rule nisi, or affirms verdict of guilty. When the party is in custody. When the party is at large. And be it enacted, That in all cases where any of the said Courts at Westminster shall refuse any such motion for a rule nisi, as aforesaid, or shall affirm any verdict of guilty against any defendant, and such defendant shall then be in custody awaiting the determination of such motion, and sentence shall have been pronounced upon such defendant, either by the Court before which the defendant shall have been tried, or by any of the said Courts at Westminster, the sheriff and the gaoler or other officer in whose custody such defendant shall then be, and all other officers to whom the execution of such sentence shall pertain, shall, upon service of an office-copy of the rule of such Court refusing such motion, or affirming such verdict, proceed to carry such sentence into execution according to due course of law; and in all cases where any such motion shall be refused, or any verdict of guilty shall be affirmed by any of the said Courts at Westminster, and the defendant shall then be at large, it shall and may be lawful for such Court at Westminster as last aforesaid, to issue a warrant for the apprehension, and for conveying him to the proper goal or house of correction, in order that such defendant may undergo such punishment as shall have been awarded against him, and such warrant shall be of force and effect throughout England, and may be executed by any officer of the said Court or any constable or peace officer in England.

7. The judge at the trial may reserve any point of law to be considered in a court at Westminster.—And be it enacted, That it shall and may be lawful for any Court before whom any indictment for any felony or misdemeanor shall be tried, to reserve any question of law which shall arise for the consideration of such one of the said Courts at Westminster as shall be named by the defendant in such case; and it shall and may be lawful for each of the said Courts at Westminster, in every case whatever which shall be brought before them under the provisions of this Act, whether upon motion or by writ of error, or on any question of law reserved as aforesaid, by rule, to order a verdict of not guilty to be entered, and judgment thereon, or to order a new trial to be had, or to order the judgment to be arrested or reserved, or to make such other order, and to give such other judgment as upon the whole matter shall appear to such Court to be right and just.

When the sentence is postponed.*—And be in enacted, That if any defendant having been found guilty, shall by himself or his counsel or attorney, before sentence is pronounced, declare his intention to appeal by motion to either of the Courts at Westminster as aforesaid, or to bring a writ of error, or if the Court before whom such defendant shall have been tried shall reserve any such question of law as aforesaid, or shall otherwise think proper, it shall and may be lawful for such Court in its discretion, either to pronounce a sentence to be carried into execution at such time after the determination of such appeal, writ of error, or question reserved as aforesaid, as to such Court shall seem meet, or to postpone the pronouncing of sentence until after such determination as aforesaid, or to pronounce a sentence to be executed as if no such appeal or writ of error were to be made or brought, or question reserved; and in case such Court shall postpone the sentence as aforesaid, or pronounce a sentence to be carried into execution after such determination as aforesaid, it shall and may be lawful for such Court in its discretion to order such defendant to be detained in custody until the determination of such appeal, writ of error, or question of law reserved as aforesaid, or be discharged out of custody upon entering into such recognizance, either with or without sureties, and subject to such condition as to such Court in its discretion may seem meet, and every such recognizance shall be and continue in full force and effect until the condition of such recognizance shall have been fully performed; and in every case where any Court shall have postponed passing sentence upon any defendant, and the verdict against such defendant shall be affirmed by any one of the said Courts at Westminster, it shall and may be lawful for such Court at Westminster to pronounce sentence upon such defendant; and every such sentence shall have the same force and effect, to all intents and purposes whatsoever, as if the same sentence had been pronounced by the Court before whom such defendant was tried; and every such sentence shall be inserted in the rule of such Court to be made as aforesaid, and form part of the judgment or order of such Court, and shall be carried into effect, and in all things be performed, obeyed and executed by all sheriffs, gaolers and other officers to whom the execution thereof shall appertain.

9. Sentence on defendants in cases where sentence has not been pronounced by the Court before whom defendant was tried.—And be it enacted, That whenever any Court before whom any defendant shall have been found guilty, shall have postponed pronouncing sentence upon any such defendant, and any of the said Courts at Westminster shall have affirmed such verdict, but shall not have pronounced sentence upon any such defendant under the provisions of this Act, it shall and may be lawful for any judge at the Central Criminal Court, or any judge of assize, oyer and terminer, gaol delivery or nisi prius, or any justices of the peace at any general or quarter sessions of the peace, or any recorder of any borough, or any judge of any other court having jurisdiction to try any felony or misdemeanor, at any session of such court respectively before which such defendant shall have been so found guilty as aforesaid, holden after such verdict shall have been affirmed as aforesaid, to pronounce sentence upon such defendant in like manner as the Court before which such defendant was tried might have pronounced as last aforesaid, shall be good and valid in law to all intents and purposes whatsoever.

10. A bill of exceptions may be tendered. A writ of error allowed. Writ of error to the House of Lords.—And be it enacted, That it shall and may be lawful for the defendant or his counsel, upon the trial of any indictment for any felony or misdemeanor, at any time before sentence shall be pronounced, to tender a bill of exceptions to the opinion and direction of the Court upon such trial, upon any matter of law whatsoever: provided always, that it shall be sufficient to tender the substance of such exception in writing to the said Court before the sentence shall have been pronounced, and the same shall be drawn up in form within such a reasonable time afterwards as such Court shall appoint, and that in every such case it shall and may be lawful for such defendant to sue out from the Crown-office a writ of error, in the form in the schedule hereunto annexed, and which said writ of error shall be granted upon a certificate of any serjeant-at-law or barrister-at-law, that he considers it a proper case for a writ of error, and that it shall not be necessary in any such case to obtain the fiat of the Attorney General or Solicitor-General for the issuing of such writ, and such writ of error shall be served upon the clerk of assize, or other officer having the custody of the records of the Court before whom such trial was had; and such clerk of assize or other officer shall make a copy of the record, and annex thereto the minutes of the evidence, or the material part thereof, and the bill of exceptions; which said minutes and bill of exceptions shall be delivered to him by or on behalf of the defendant for that purpose, signed by the Court before whom the defendant shall have been tried (which signature such Court is hereby empowered and required to affix thereto), and shall transmit the same, together with the writ of error, to the Master of the Crown-office, to be by him produced before such one of the Courts at Westminster as shall be named by the defendant in such writ of error, and such Court shall thereupon proceed to hear and determine the same; and such Court shall have the same powers and authorities in all respects as are hereinbefore given to the said Courts at Westminster, in case of motions made on the behalf of any defendant or upon questions of law reserved; and the judgments of such Courts shall be by rules, and every such rule shall be of the like force and effect, and shall be obeyed and executed in the same manner as the rules hereinbefore mentioned; and that it shall and may be lawful for the prosecutor or defendant to bring a writ of error upon such lastmentioned judgment to the House of Lords, and the proceedings for that purpose shall be the same as may now by law be had upon a writ of error in criminal cases from the Court of Exchequer-Chamber to the House of Lords: provided always, That every writ of error brought under the provisions of this Act shall be sued out within one month after the delivery of the judgment upon which such writ is issued, and not afterwards.

11. Proceedings as to indictments, non-repair of highways, &c.—And be it enacted, That it shall and may be lawful for any of the said Courts at Westminster, in any case where a verdict of not guilty has been given upon any indictment for the non-repair, obstruction, or damage of or to any highway or bridge, or for any nuisance, to order such verdict to be set aside, and a new trial to be had in case it shall appear to such Court that it is expedient to the ends of justice so to do; and the rules to be pronounced in such cases, and all proceedings thereupon, shall be in like manner and of like force and effect as hereinbefore provided in respect of the rules upon motion hereinbefore mentioned: provided always, that nothing in this Act contained shall be construed to empower any of the Courts at Westminster aforesaid to grant any new trial in any other case where a defendant has been acquitted of any felony or misdemeanor by the verdict of a jury.

12. The defendant need not be present at the motions in the courts at Westminster.—And be it enacted, That it shall in no case be necessary for any defendant to be present before any of the said Courts at Westminster during the hearing or determining any case under the provisions of this Act, and that every judgment pronounced by any of the said Courts at Westminster under the provisions of this Act, in the absence of any defendant, shall be as valid and effectual as if the defendant had been present when the same was pronounced.

13. Audience by barrister in the Court of Common Pleas.—And be it enacted, That for the purposes of this Act and in all matters relating to such proceedings as in this Act mentioned, her Majesty's counsel learned in the law, and all other barristers-at-law, shall and may, according to their respective rank and seniority, have and exercise equal right and privilege of practising, pleading, and audience in the said Court of Common Pleas; and that it shall not be lawful for the said Court of Common Pleas to exclude the parties to any such proceedings from appearing or being heard by counsel before the said Court.

14. Copies of the record.—And be it enacted, That whenever any motion shall be made which may render it necessary to produce a copy of any indictment or record before any of the Courts at Westminster, the defendant shall before or at the time of making such motion as aforesaid, cause a copy of such indictment or record, certified by the proper officer, as hereinafter provided, to be deposited with the proper officer of the said court: Provided always, That if in any case such copy shall not have been so deposited as aforesaid, and the Court shall think it necessary that such copy should be produced, it shall and may be lawful for the said Court to order such copy to be obtained by the defendant, and deposited with such officer as aforesaid, and for that purpose to adjourn the case till such time as such Court shall think fit.

15. Copy of indictment to be delivered before or after trial, on application of defendant.—And be it enacted, That in all cases of prosecution for any crime or misdemeanour, a copy of the indictment or record shall be delivered, either before or after sentence has been pronounced, to the defendant or his clerk in court, or attorney, upon application made for the same to the clerk of assize or other officer who shall have the custody of the same, at a reasonable time and place, on payment of a reasonable sum for the same, not exceeding for each folio of ninety words; and every such copy shall be signed and certified to be a true copy by the clerk of assize or such other officer so having the custody of such indictment or record, or by the deputy of such clerk or other officer; and every such copy purporting to be signed and certified as aforesaid, shall be deemed and taken for all intents and purposes whatsoever to be as good and effectual as the indictment or record whereof it is a copy, without proof of the signature, or official character of the person appearing to have signed the same; and every such clerk of assize, officer or deputy as aforesaid who shall certify any writing as a true and authentic copy of any indictment or record, knowing the same to be false in any material part, and every person who shall counterfeit the signature of any such clerk, officer or deputy as aforesaid for the purpose of counterfeiting or certifying copy of any indictment or record, or shall utter any such copy of any indictment or record with a false or counterfeit signature thereto, knowing the same to be false or counterfeit, or shall utter any writing as a true and authentic copy of any indictment or record so certified as aforesaid, knowing the same to be false in any material part, shall be guilty of felony, and being duly convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be transported beyond the seas for life, or for any term not less than seven years, or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding four years.

16. Records may be removed from general or quarter sessions to be held at the assizes, either in the criminal or the civil side thereof, or by a special jury.—And whereas it is sometimes expedient and conducive to the ends of justice that an indictment found at the general or quarter sessions of the peace should be tried at the assizes to be holden for the same county wherein such court of sessions is holding, or that an indictment found at the assizes should be tried by a special jury, or on the civil side; be it therefore enacted, That it shall and may be lawful for any of the said Courts at Westminster, or any judge of the said Courts, to order that any indictment found at any general or quarter sessions of the peace, shall be tried at the assizes to be holden in the same county wherein the said court of sessions is holden, either on the civil or crown side, either by a common or special jury, or that any indictment found at the assizes shall be tried by a special jury either on the civil or crown side; and in every case where such indictment shall be ordered to be tried by a special jury, such jury shall be struck in the manner provided in and by the statute passed in the sixth year of the reign of his late Majesty King George the Fourth, intituled, "An Act for consolidating and amending the Laws relative to Jurors and Juries," and that all the provisions of the said Act shall be applicable to all causes tried by special juries under the provisions of this Act; and where any indictment found at any quarter sessions shall be ordered to be tried at the assizes, the clerk of the peace, or his deputy, shall, upon being served with an office copy of such rule or order, transmit such indictment to the clerk of assize for the county where such indictment was found, or where such indictment shall be ordered to be tried; and that every trial, and all proceedings had under and by virtue of any such order, shall be as good, valid, and effectual to all intents and purposes as if the same trial and proceedings had taken place in the usual and ordinary course; and every Court before whom any trial shall take place by virtue of any such order shall have the same power, jurisdiction and authority to pass sentence, to award costs and to do all other matters and things to all intents and purposes, as the Court before which the indictment so ordered to be tried would have been tried in the ordinary course.

17. Indictments may, without removal by writ of certiorari, or of error, be quashed, or the judgments thereon reversed.—And whereas the removal of indictments and records by writs of certiorari and writs of error, for the purpose of objecting to the sufficiency thereof, is frequently attended with great and unnecessary expense and delay: for remedy thereof, be it enacted, That it shall and may be lawful for any prosecutor or defendant in any case of felony or misdemeanor, to apply by motion to any of the said Courts at Westminster, upon production of such certified copy of any indictment or record as aforesaid, to quash such indictment, or to reverse the judgment contained in such record; and that every judgment pronounced by any of the said Courts at Westminster, upon any such copy of any indictment or record as aforesaid, shall be of the same force and effect as if the same had been pronounced upon such indictment or record after the same had been removed by writ of certiorari or writ of error.

18. Interpretation clause.—And be it enacted, That wherever in this Act words have been used importing the singular number or the masculine gender only, yet the Act shall be understood to include several matters as well as one matter, and several persons as well as one person, and females as well as males, and bodies corporate as well as individuals, unless there be something repugnant to such construction; and the word "defendant" shall be construed to include any person or persons, or the inhabitants of any county, riding, borough, county of a city, county of a town, parish, township, hundred, or any other district, or any body corporate indicted for any felony or misdemeanor; and that the word "indictment" shall be construed to intend any indictment, information, presentment, or inquisition; and that the word "record" shall be construed to include all rolls, records, writs and documents whatsoever in the nature of records; and that the word "county" shall be construed to include any county, riding, county of a city, county of a town, city, cinque port, borough, or town-corporate; and that the word "court" shall be construed to include every judge of assize, oyer and terminer or gaol delivery, recorder, or court of general or quarter sessions, or judge, or chairman, justice or justices thereof respectively.

19. The construction of this Act.—And be it enacted, That this Act, and every clause and provision therein contained, shall be construed liberally and beneficially, and so as to effect the objects and intention of the said Act, in as full and ample a manner in all respects as may be.

20. Commencement of this Act.—And be it enacted, That this Act shall commence and take effect from and after the

2. Proceedings in cases where it shall be determined that banns may be published and marriages solemnized. How fees to be disposed of.—And be it enacted, That when and so soon as it shall be determined that banns of matrimony may be published and marriages solemnized in any such church or chapel, the bishop of the diocese within which such church or chapel shall be locally situated, whether in any parish or extra-parochial place, or otherwise, shall certify the same, and such certificate shall be kept in the chest of the church or chapel with the books of registry thereof, and a copy thereof shall be entered in the books of the registry of banns and marriages, and a duplicate of such certificate shall be registered in the registry of the diocese, and such certificate shall be deemed and taken to be conclusive evidence in all courts, and in all questions relating to any banns published or marriages solemnized in any such

Cap. LIX.

An Act for better regulating the Offices of Lecturers and Parish Clerks. (July 29, 1844.)

We give this statute entire.

Lecturers or preachers may be required to perform other clerical duties in certain cases. Saving the rights of present holders.—Whereas in divers districts, parishes, and places there now are or hereafter may be certain lecturers or preachers in the holy orders of deacon or priest of the United Church of England and Ireland elected or otherwise appointed to deliver or preach lectures or sermons only, without the obligation of performing other clerical or ministerial duties; and whereas it is expedient in many cases that such lecturers or preachers should be authorized and required to perform other clerical and ministerial duties, and to act, if necessary, as assistant curates, in such districts, parishes, or places: Be it therefore enacted by the Queen's most excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, That from and after the passing of this Act it shall be lawful for the bishop of the diocese wherein any such lecturers or preachers shall be so elected or appointed as aforesaid, if he shall think fit, with the assent of the incumbent of every such district, parish, or place, to require, by writing under his hand and seal, any such lecturer or preacher to undertake and perform such other clerical or ministerial duties, as assistant curate or otherwise, within such district, parish, or place, as the said bishop, with the assent of such incumbent as aforesaid, shall think proper, and also to vary from time to time, if necessary, and with the like assent, the particular duties so required to be performed as aforesaid; and in case such lecturer or preacher shall at any time refuse or neglect duly and faithfully to perform such additional duties, and to act in the manner required by the said bishop as aforesaid, it shall be lawful for the said bishop to summon the said lecturer or preacher to appear before him, and thereupon the said bishop, with the assistance of one at least of the archdeacons and also of the chancellor of such diocese, shall proceed summarily to inquire into the facts of the case, and to adjudicate thereon, and, if necessary, to suspend or remove the said lecturer or preacher from his said office, and to declare the same vacant; but nevertheless such lecturer or preacher may, within fourteen days next after the passing or making of any such sentence or declaration, appeal therefrom to the archbishop of the province, who shall thereupon forthwith summarily hear and determine the same; and if no such appeal be made within the time aforesaid, or if the said sentence or declaration shall upon such appeal be affirmed by the said archbishop, the said bishop shall then cause the same to be forthwith duly published in the church or chapel wherein the said lecturer or preacher hath been used to deliver or preach his said lectures or sermons by virtue of his said office, and thereupon the said office shall be and be deemed to be vacant, and the parties entitled to elect or appoint a person to the same shall be entitled and required to elect or appoint a successor thereto, in the same manner as if the said lecturer or preacher were dead, and the right and interest of such lecturer or preacher to and in the said office, and to and in all the emoluments and advantages thereof, shall wholly cease and determine; provided that nothing herein contained shall affect or be deemed applicable to any lecturer or preacher who shall have been elected or appointed to his said office before the passing of this Act, unless such lecturer or preacher shall consent to be bound thereby.

2. Power to appoint persons in holy orders to the office of church clerk, and to require such persons to act as assistant curates, if necessary.—And be it enacted, That when and so often after the passing of this Act as any vacancy shall occur in the office of church clerk, chapel clerk, or parish clerk, in any district, parish, or place, it shall be lawful for the rector or other incumbent or other the person or persons entitled for the time being to appoint or elect such church clerk, chapel clerk, or parish clerk as aforesaid, if he shall think fit, to appoint or elect a person in the holy orders of deacon or priest of the United church of England and Ireland to fill the said office of church clerk, chapel clerk, or parish clerk; and such person so appointed or elected as aforesaid shall, when duly licensed as hereinafter provided, be entitled to have and receive all the profits and emoluments of and belonging to the said office, and shall also be liable in respect thereof, so long as he shall hold the same, to perform all such spiritual and ecclesiastical duties within such district, parish, or place, as the said rector or other incumbent, with the sanction of the bishop of the diocese, may from time to time require; but such person in holy orders so appointed or elected as aforesaid shall not by reason of such appointment or election have or acquire any freehold or absolute right to or interest in the said office of church clerk, chapel clerk, or parish clerk, or to or in any of the profits or emoluments thereof; but every such person in holy orders so appointed or elected as aforesaid shall at all times be liable to be suspended or removed from the said office, in the same manner and by the same authority, and for such or the like causes, as those whereby any stipendiary curate may be lawfully suspended or removed; such suspension or removal nevertheless being subject to the same power of appeal to the archbishop of the province to which any stipendiary curate is or may be entitled.

3. Such person to be licensed by the bishop, and when appointed otherwise than by the bishop to be subject to the approval of the incumbent.—Provided always, and be it enacted, That every such appointment or election as last aforesaid, if made by any other person or persons than the rector or other incumbent of such district, parish, or place, shall be subject to the consent or approval of such rector or other incumbent of such district, parish, or place; and that no person in holy orders so appointed or elected as aforesaid shall be competent to perform any of the duties of his said office, or any other spiritual or ecclesiastical duties, within such district, parish, or place, or to receive or take any of the profits or emoluments of his said office, unless and until he shall have duly obtained from the bishop of the diocese within which such district, parish, or place is situate such license and authority in that behalf as are required and usual in respect of stipendiary curates; but nevertheless such license and authority, when so obtained as aforesaid, shall entitle the person so obtaining it to hold the said office, and to receive and take the profits and emoluments thereof as aforesaid, until he shall have resigned the same, or have been so suspended or removed as aforesaid, without any annual or other re-appointment or re-election thereto.

4. Appointments of assistant clergy under this Act not to exempt incumbents from the duty of providing curates in cases where they are now liable.—Provided also, and be it enacted, That no rector or other incumbent of any district, parish, or place wherein any such person or persons shall be so employed as aforesaid, or wherein any lecturer or preacher shall have been required to undertake and perform other clerical and ministerial duties, in the manner hereinbefore provided, or wherein any person in holy orders shall have been appointed or elected to fill the office of church clerk, chapel clerk, or parish clerk as aforesaid, shall by reason of any such provisions be exempt from any duty or obligation of employing within the same district, parish, or place any curate or other assistant to which by any law, statute, canon, or usage, he is or may be already liable; but it shall be lawful for the bishop of the diocese from time to time to require every such rector or other incumbent to provide, or for the said bishop to nominate and license, such other curates and assistants to officiate within every such district, parish, or place, in addition, either to, the person or persons so intended to be employed as aforesaid, or to such lecturer or preacher, and to such church clerk, chapel clerk, or parish clerk, and to make regulations for the payment of the stipends of such other curates and assistants, as fully and in the same manner and subject to the same restrictions as he might have done by law if this Act had not been passed.

5. Power to suspend or remove church clerks not in holy orders who may be guilty of neglect or misbehaviour.—And be it enacted, That if at any time it shall appear, upon complaint or otherwise, to any archdeacon or other ordinary that any person not in holy orders, holding or exercising the office of church clerk, chapel clerk, or parish clerk in any district, parish, or place within and subject to his jurisdiction, has been guilty of any wilful neglect of or misbehaviour in his said office, or that by reason of any misconduct he is an unfit and improper person to hold or exercise the same, it shall be lawful for such archdeacon or other ordinary forthwith to summon such church clerk, chapel clerk, or parish clerk to appear before him, and also by writing under his hand, or by such process as is commonly used in any of the courts Ecclesiastical for procuring the attendance of witnesses, to call before him all such persons as may be competent to give evidence or information respecting any of the matters imputed to or charged against such church clerk, chapel clerk, or parish clerk as aforesaid; and such archdeacon or other ordinary shall and may, if he see fit, examine upon oath, to be by him administered in that behalf, any of the persons so appearing or attending before him respecting any of the matters aforesaid, and shall and may thereupon summarily hear and determine the truth of the matters so imputed to or charged against such church clerk, chapel clerk, or parish clerk or aforesaid; and if upon such investigation it shall appear to the satisfaction of such archdeacon or other ordinary that the matters so imputed to or charged against such church clerk, chapel clerk, or parish clerk are true, it shall be lawful for the said archdeacon or other ordinary forthwith to suspend or remove such church clerk, chapel clerk, or parish clerk from his said office, and by certificate under his hand and seal directed to the rector or other officiating minister of the parish, district, or place wherein such church clerk, chapel clerk, or parish clerk held or exercised his said office, to declare the said office vacant, and a copy of such certificate shall thereupon, by such rector or other officiating minister, be affixed to the principal door of the church or chapel in which the said church clerk, chapel clerk, or parish clerk usually exercised his said office; and the person or persons who upon the vacancy of such office are entitled to elect or appoint a person to fill the same, shall and may forthwith proceed to elect or appoint some other person to fill the same in the place of the said church clerk, chapel clerk, or parish clerk so removed as aforesaid: Provided always, that the exercise of such office by a sufficient deputy who shall duly and faithfully perform the duties thereof, and in all respects well and properly demean himself, shall not be deemed a wilful neglect of his office on the part of such church clerk, chapel clerk, or parish clerk, so as to render him liable, for such cause alone, to be suspended or removed therefrom.

6. Power to remove person ceasing to be employed as mentioned in this Act from premises held by him in right of his employment.—And be it enacted, That in case any person, having ceased to be employed in any of the offices or duties in this Act mentioned or referred to, or having been duly suspended or removed from any such office or employment as aforesaid, shall at any time refuse or neglect to give up the possession of any house, building, land, or premises, or any part or parcel thereof, by him held or occupied by virtue or in respect of any such office or employment as aforesaid, it shall be lawful for the bishop of the diocese, upon complaint thereof to him made, to summon such person forthwith personally to appear before him, and to shew cause for such refusal or neglect; and upon the failure of the person so summoned as aforesaid to obey such summons, or, upon his appearance, to shew to the said bishop such cause as may be deemed by the said bishop sufficient for such refusal or neglect, the said bishop shall thereupon grant a certificate of the facts aforesaid, under his hand and seal, to the person or persons entitled to the possession of such house, building, land, or premises as aforesaid, who may thereupon go before any neighbouring justice of the peace; and such justice, upon production of such certificate, and proof of such wrongful retention of possession as aforesaid, shall and he is hereby required to issue his warrant under his hand and seal, directed to the constables or other peace officers of the district, parish, or place within which such house, building, land, or premises is or are situate, or to the constables or other peace officers of any neighbouring district, parish, or place, requiring them forthwith to expel and remove from the said house, building, land, or premises, and from every part and parcel thereof, the person so wrongfully retaining possession thereof, and to deliver the peaceable possession thereof to the person or persons so entitled to the same as aforesaid; and such constables or other peace officers shall and they are hereby required promptly and effectually to obey and execute such warrant, according to the exigency thereof, and thereupon it shall be lawful for them also to levy, upon the goods and chattels of the person so by them expelled and removed as aforesaid, the necessary costs and expenses of executing such warrant, the amount whereof, in case the same shall be disputed, shall be forthwith settled and determined by the said justice of the peace by whom the said warrant was so issued as aforesaid, or by any other justice of the peace residing in or near to the said district, parish, or place, whose decision thereupon shall be final, and who is hereby authorized to make such order in that behalf as to him shall seem reasonable.

CAP. LXI.

An Act to annex detached Parts of Counties to the Counties in which they are situated. (August 6, 1844.)

We give this statute entire:—

1. Detached portions of counties to be part of the county by which they are surrounded. 2 & 3 Wm. 4, c. 64; 6 & 7 Vict. c. 12.- Whereas there exist in England and Wales parts of counties detached from the main body of the county, and delay and hindrance to the administration of justice ensue, and inconvenience in other respects; and it is desirable to remedy the said evil: be it therefore enacted by the Queen's most excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, That from and after the twentieth day of October next every part of any county in England or Wales which is detached from the main body of such county shall be considered for all purposes as forming part of that county of which it is considered a part for the purposes of the election of members to serve in Parliament as knights of the shire, under the provisions of an Act passed in the third year of the reign of his late Majesty, intituled "An Act to settle and to describe the Divisions of Counties and the Limits of Cities and Boroughs in England and Wales, in so far as respects the Election of Members to serve in Parliament:" Provided always, that nothing herein contained shall be construed to alter the county, riding, or division to which any such detached part shall be deemed to belong for the purpose of holding inquests, under the provisions of an Act passed in the sixth year of the reign of her Majesty, intituled "An Act for the more convenient holding of Coroners' Inquests."

2. Detached parts to belong to adjoining hundred, &c., or to form a separate hundred. And be it enacted, That every such detached portion which under the provisions of this Act shall be annexed for purposes other than that of voting for members of Parliament to any county to which it did not belong for such purposes before the passing of this Act shall thenceforth be taken to be part of the hundred, wapentake, ward, rape, lathe, or other like division by which it is wholly or for the most part surrounded, or to which it is next adjoining, in the county to which it will thenceforth belong, unless the justices of the county, riding, parts, or division, in General or Quarter Session assembled, shall declare it to be a new or separate hundred or other like division, which they shall be empowered to do; and it shall be lawful for the justices of such county, riding, parts, or division, in General or Quarter Sessions assembled, in every case in which there shall appear to them to be any doubt to which of such divisions any such detached part shall belong under this Act, to declare the division to which it shall be taken to belong; and such determination shall be final and conclusive, and shall be published in the London Gazette, the production of which paper shall be evidence thereof.

3. Provision as to special and petty sessions. 9 Geo. 4, c. 43; 6 & 7 Wm. 4, c. 12.—And be it enacted, That in all cases where any such detached part of a county shall have formed before the passing of this Act a separate division in which special and petty sessions of the peace for such county shall have been usually holden, such detached part shall remain a separate division for special and petty sessions of the county to which it shall be annexed after the passing of this Act, until the justices of the county, riding, parts, or division to which it shall be annexed after the passing of this Act shall have re-constituted such division for special and petty sessions of the peace, under the provisions of an Act passed in the ninth year of the reign of King George the Fourth, intituled "An Act for the better Regulation of Divisions in the several Counties of England and Wales," and also of an Act passed in the sixth and seventh years of the reign of King William the Fourth, intituled "An Act for amending an Act of the ninth Year of the Reign of his late Majesty King George the Fourth, intituled 'An Act for the better Regulation of Divisions in the several Counties of England and Wales.'"

4. Error in stating name of county not to invalidate legal documents.—Provided always, and be it enacted, That no judicial proceeding, or deed or other instrument in writing, shall be invalidated by reason of any error in stating the name of the county to which such detached portion originally belonged, instead of the county to which it will belong under this Act, or the converse; and that every proceeding at law, whether civil or criminal, already commenced, or to be commenced before the twentieth day of October next, shall and may be prosecuted and heard and determined exactly as if this Act had not been passed, save and except in so far as it shall be otherwise ordered by any of her Majesty's superior courts of common law having jurisdiction in any case in which such order shall be made.

5. Saving of ecclesiastical rights.—Provided always, and be it enacted, That nothing herein contained shall alter or interfere with any ecclesiastical jurisdiction or right of patronage.

6. Saving the rights of certain coroners.—And whereas as to some such detached parts there are coroners appointed expressly for and having jurisdiction in such detached parts only; be it therefore enacted, That as to every such detached part for which at the time of the passing of this Act there is a coroner appointed for and acting in such detached part, such coroner shall during his life, or until he shall resign or be removed from his office, continue to hold and exercise his office and jurisdiction within such detached part in as ample a manner as if this Act had not been passed.

7. Act not to extend to alter or affect the land-tax or assessed taxes in detached portions of counties.—Provided always, and be it enacted, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to affect or alter the assessments of the land tax or assessed taxes in or for any such detached portion of a county, or to extend or diminish the jurisdiction of any commissioners acting therein in the execution of the Acts relating to the said taxes respectively, but that all such detached portions shall be subject in that behalf to the jurisdiction of the commissioners acting for the same county or district as they would have been subject to if this Act had not been passed; and all parishes and parts of parishes and places, and all manors, lands, tenements, and hereditaments within any such detached portion, shall continue chargeable towards raising the land-tax charged upon the same county or other district to or in aid of which they have heretofore contributed a quota or portion of such land-tax.

So far as the criminal warrants go, no suspicion arises that unfairness or impartiality has directed their issue. With regard to the other class of warrants, though there have been some few issued by different administrations that have been in power during the last twenty-two years, in regard to which it is obvious that on a subsequent review of the facts a difference of opinion might arise as to the discretion exercised in each particular case, yet your committee see no reason to doubt that the conduct of the Secretaries of State belonging to each of those administrations has been guided by no motive than an anxious desire to preserve the public peace, with the maintenance of which they were charged.

It does not appear to your committee necessary to follow the warrant from the time of its reception at the Post-office to that of its execution. The letters which have been detained and opened are, unless retained by special order, as sometimes happens in criminal cases, closed and resealed, without affixing any mark to indicate that they have been so detained and opened; and are forwarded by post according to their respective superscriptions.

There are other cases, under the 33rd and 36th chapters of the 1st of Victoria, besides the case we have been considering, in which post letters may lawfully be detained, or delayed, or opened, by an officer of the Post-office. These excepted cases are the following:—when the person consents, to whom the letter is directed—when the letter is returned for want of due direction—when the person to whom it is directed is dead or cannot be found, or shall have refused it, or shall have refused or neglected to pay the postage thereof. If any letter not included in the above exceptional cases be opened, delayed, detained, or abstracted at the Post-office, through the malpractices of any officers of that department, such offenders are liable to severe punishment under the latter of these Acts.

With regard to all other inland letters, your committee are assured by the Postmaster-General, by the Secretary of the Post-office, and by the President of the Inland Department at the General Post-office, that the secrecy of correspondence is inviolate; and this assurance they have seen no reason to doubt.

Your committee will here notice a statement which has been made, that letter-bags from Dublin, Brighton, and other places, have of late, before being opened, been taken, out of the usual course, into an inner room of the inland-office at the General Post-office, for the purpose of being there examined. The allegation of fact is correct, so far as counting the letters, and observing their external appearance goes. This is frequently done in order to ascertain the condition of the bags on their arrival, before their contents are delivered over to be sorted, it having been found a necessary check upon the commission of irregularities by the subordinate functionaries of the post-office; but this examination has no connection whatever with the opening of letters under warrant, and it is not the method practised when letters are detained and opened by authority of the Secretary of State.

On the subject of the foreign department at the General Post-office, the secrecy of foreign correspondence your committee are assured is kept inviolate. Certain warrants, bearing respectively the signatures of the Right Honourable Charles James Fox, when Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, in 1752, and of his successor, the Marquis of Carmarthen, were laid before your committee, which, being of a very comprehensive nature, have, in conjunction with other information, induced your committee to believe that diplomatic correspondence, when posted in ordinary course, incurred in this country and in the other great states of Europe nearly equal risk of inspection. How long similar warrants continued, and when they were finally recalled, your committee have no information, nor do they think it their duty to report as to any practice which may have existed in reference to this part of the subject. Of this they are satisfied, that no such warrants or practices now exist; and that public as well as private correspondence, foreign as well as domestic, passing through the office in regular course, now enjoys complete security, subject only to the contingency of a secretary of state's warrant, directed for special reasons against a particular letter or letters.

In making the above statement, however, it is right to observe that there exists another channel of communication with foreign countries, by means of the King's messengers and Foreign-office bags. This is not under the control of the Postmaster-general, but of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. It is conducted by officers appointed and paid by the latter, from whom alone they receive their orders, and to whom alone they are responsible. Some years ago no inconsiderable number of private letters, passing between this and foreign countries, was sent and received by these bags; but this abuse (for such it was, as payment of postage was thus evaded) has been almost entirely discontinued; and your committee believe that at present the bags contain little more than the official correspondence of our own diplomatic agents, and of the ministers of such foreign states as may choose to avail themselves of that mode of transmitting their despatches. The authority of your committee extends no farther than to inquire how correspondence is dealt with, while remaining in the custody of the Post-office.

It remains for your committee, after treating of the correspondence in Great Britain, to make a brief statement as to the law and practice regarding the same matters in Ireland. The statute of Anne extended to that country, and whatever legal force the warrants of the principal Secretaries of State, directing the opening of letters, had in Great Britain, the same force those warrants had in Ireland. But previously to passing, in 1783, of the Irish statute (the 23 and 24 of Geo. 3, c. 17), intituled "An Act for Establishing a Post-office in this Kingdom," the principal secretaries were in the habit of delegating to the Lord Lieutenant authority for this purpose. Nor was this all; for by a warrant, dated October 31st, 1740, Secretary the Duke of Newcastle directs Sir Marmaduke Wyvill, the Postmaster-general for Ireland, to open and detain all such letters as the Duke of Devonshire, then Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, or any other person appointed by him, should authorize and direct: copies to be sent to the duke.

The necessity for having recourse to a twice delegated authority was removed by the statute above referred to, which gave the same indemnity to persons in Ireland opening letters by authority of the Lord Lieutenant, that the statute of Anne gave to persons in Great Britain and Ireland, opening letters by authority of a principal Secretary of State.

Your committee here submit an abstract of the warrants issued by the Lord Lieutenant, or other chief governor or governors of Ireland, to the postmaster-general for Ireland, for every year from 1832 to the present time, being a period of twelve years and a half. They have added another abstract, arranging the warrants under different heads, according to the grounds whereon they were issued:—

The lords lieutenant and others who have signed these warrants are arranged in the following list, according to the date:—

1834 .. E. J. Littleton (secretary).
— . Marquess Wellesley.
1835 .. Earl of Mulgrave.
1836 .. Ditto.
— .. T. Drummond (secretary).
1837 .. Ditto.
— . Lord Plunkett (one of the Lords Justices).
— .. Archbishop of Dublin (ditto).
1838 . Lord Morpeth (secretary).
1839 .. Marquess of Normanby.
— .. Lord Viscount Ebrington.
— . Gen. Sir T. Blakeney (one of the Lords Justices).
1840 . Lord Viscount Ebrington.
1841 . Chief Justice Bushe (one of the Lords Justices).
— . Earl de Grey.
1842 . Ditto.
— .. Sir E. Sugden (one of the Lords Justices).
1843 .. Earl de Grey.

The warrants issued in Ireland do not exceed three per annum, on the average. Each warrant comprehends, on the average, about two persons.

The only warrant which bears the signature of the late Chief Justice Bushe, one of the lords justices, was issued with a view to obtain a clue to a murder; but it appearing that the magistrate to whom it was sent had applied for it for another purpose, that of ascertaining the state of the country, this was not assented to, and the warrant was not acted upon.

There are no data to shew how many letters were opened under each warrant, nor how long each warrant remained in force; four of the thirty-one warrants bear the signature of only the Secretary for Ireland. More than a third of the warrants concern Ribbonism, which wore a peculiarly threatening aspect in one particular year. The letters in Ireland are not opened by the Postmaster-general, but by a confidential clerk in the office of the Chief Secretary for Ireland.

The committee have, in conclusion, to lay before the House the following observations for their consideration, arising out of the facts which it has been their duty to state.

1. With regard to the utility of the warrants issued in furtherance of criminal justice, their annual average in Great Britain does not exceed six, and this number of warrants does not extend to the letters of more, on an average, than twelve persons a year. There is no evidence whatever to shew in what proportion of cases these warrants lead to discovery. On the other hand, therefore, it will be doubted by some, taking into account the strong moral feeling which exists against the practice of opening letters, with its accompaniments of mystery and concealment, whether it is worth retaining in this class of cases. On the other hand it must be admitted that these are not the cases in favour of which public feeling is most enlisted; and that of all that give rise to the exercise of this power, they present the least temptation to abuse.

2. With regard to the utility of such warrants, for the detection of seditious conspiracies, or other practices endangering the public safety, or the discovery of the views entertained by those who engage in them, it would be unreasonable to deny that, in certain cases, this practice may have aided the executive government in various ways, and amongst others which are more obvious, by informing them of the real strength of the conspirators and extent of their combinations, and thus preventing the ministers of the time from taking exaggerated views of the force arrayed against the state, and claiming extraordinary powers to meet apprehended danger. Still, however, the argument derived from the smallness of the number of warrants as compared with the number of persons who may be supposed to entertain such criminal designs, is not to be lost sight of; while, on the other hand, it must be admitted that the number of those to whom this class of warrants would apply, as being the chosen leaders of multitudes, would not be very great. The warrants of this class have amounted, on the average, to little more than two a year, which would extend to little more than four persons. The greatest number of warrants of this description, issued in any year within the present century, is about sixteen, extending in these cases to between forty or fifty persons. In addition to the argument derived from the smallness of the number affected, it must not be forgotten that, after the publicity given to the fact, that the Secretary of State has occasionally recourse to the opening of letters as a means of defence in dangerous and difficult times, few who hereafter may engage in dangerous designs will venture to communicate their intentions by the medium of the post; and the importance of retaining the power, as a measure of detective police, will consequently be greatly diminished. The last argument, however, supposes that there is no absolute certainty that a letter may not be intercepted; and it may appear to some, that to leave it a mystery whether or no this power is ever exercised, is the way best calculated to deter the evil-minded from applying the post to improper uses. It must also be remembered that if such a power as this were formally abolished, the question would not be left quite in the same condition as though the power had never been exercised or disputed; by withdrawing it, every criminal and conspirator against the public peace would be publicly assured that he should enjoy secure possession of the easiest, cheapest, and most unobserved channel of communication, and that the Secretary of State would not, under any circumstances, interfere with his correspondence. It must not be forgotten, however, that at present other rapid means of communicating their views are of easy access to the evil-intentioned, and that, as far as internal order is concerned, the same rapid means afford the government unexampled facilities for suppressing tumult.

If the result of this inquiry had been such as to impress your committee with a conviction of the importance of the frequent use of this power in the ordinary administration of affairs, they would have been prepared to recommend some legislative measures for its regulation and control; and it might not be difficult to devise regulations which would materially diminish the objections to its exercise; as, for example, that no criminal warrant should be issued except on a written information on oath; that a formal record should be preserved in the Secretary of State's office of the grounds on which every warrant had been issued, of the time during which it has remained in force, of the number of letters opened under it, and of the results obtained. It is, however, on the other hand, to be considered whether any legislative measure of this kind might not have an indirect effect in giving an additional sanction to the power in question, and thereby possibly extending its use.

Under these circumstances, it will be for Parliament to consider whether they will determine upon any legislative regulation, or whether they will prefer leaving the power, on its present footing in point of law, in the hands of the Secretary of State, to be used, on his responsibility, in those cases of emergency in which, according to the best of his judgment, its exercise would be sanctioned by an enlightened public opinion, and would appear to be strongly called for by important public interests.

Savings'-banks.—At the present period, the Act which was passed on the 9th ult. is under the consideration of the managers of several savings'-banks, on the subject of the rate of interest to be allowed to depositors. The interest payable to trustees is to be at the rate of 3*l*. 5s. per cent., and by trustees to depositors it is "not to exceed 3*l*. 0s. 10d. per cent.," the difference of 4s. 2d. a year in every 100*l*. being allowed to the trustees for the expenses of the respective establishments. It is understood that a good deal of diversity of opinion prevails with managers, and that the absence of any fixed sum to be allowed to depositors will cause a good deal of confusion. It is said that the savings'-banks cannot pay to depositors 3*l*. 0s. 10d. per cent., as the remainder allowed by the National Debt-office would not cover their expenses, and that 2*l.* 18s. 4d. would be a fair sum to be allowed as interest to depositors, which rate, it is considered, would yield an immense sum to offices where the amount deposited consists of a large sum, and embraces within their grasp a number of fractional sums on which they would pay no interest, but reap all the advantages of the same. It would have been much better if the Government had fixed the sum to be paid to depositors, for of all persons those who have recourse to savings'-banks to provide for what they call their old age, should not be left in any doubt of their rights under an Act of Parliament. The provision mentioned is to come into operation on the 20th of November next. There are twenty-three sections in the Act. By the 5th section it is provided, that in the rules of every savings'-bank every depositor therein shall, once in every year at least, cause his deposit-book to be produced at the office of the said institution for the purpose of being examined. Two copies of rules, to be made or amended by the savings'-banks, are to be submitted to Mr. Tidd Pratt, who is to return one copy, and to send the other to the National Debt-office. The practice of depositing rules with clerks of the peace is now repealed.

Tithe Commutation.—A Parliamentary document, which was moved for by Mr. Manners Sutton, has just been printed, embracing returns of all agreements for the commutation of tithes which have been confirmed by the Tithe Commissioners in the several counties of England and Wales, from the 1st of January to the 1st of July last, specifying also in each case the amount of rent-charge agreed to be paid in lieu of tithes, and shewing whether the same be payable to appropriators, impropriators, or clerical incumbents; of all awards for the commutation of tithes which have been confirmed by the Tithe Commissioners in the several counties of England and Wales in the same period; and also of all appointments of rent-charges in the period mentioned. It appears that under the first branch—agreements for the commutation of tithes which have been confirmed by the Commissioners—that the balance of increase was 691*l.* 17s. 0½d., which, with the increase in former returns of 54,722*l.* 2s. 1½d., makes the total increase 55,464*l.*, so that in England and Wales "rent-charges" will be the term used, instead of the ancient word "tithe," which existed from the earliest period, and was provided for the support of the clergy. By the second head—the awards for the commutation of tithes confirmed by the Commissioners—it is stated, that in England and Wales the total rent charges of the present return were 92,360*l.* 6s. 5¾d.; the total rent-charges of former returns, 856,371*l.* 19s. 1½d.; and the total rent-charges, 948,732*l.* 5s. 5¾d. Under the third branch, a return was made of all apportionments confirmed by the Tithe Commissioners in the period of six months ending in July last; and over the same period the two other branches have reference.

THE MAGISTRATE.

Summary.

The second article in the proposed new Law of Settlement deserves the attention of our readers. We have made some remarks upon the Winter Assize elsewhere.

POOR LAW SETTLEMENT BILL.

No. II.

3. Removal and Irremovability.

Section 7, the first clause of section 8, and section 9, all relate to, and, in some mysterious fashion, appear to be intended to define and regulate removals. If we rightly gather the purport of them, they might all be condensed into two or three lines of plain English; but we have strong misgivings, whether the authors of this Bill have not some ideas and designs wrapped up in the bottom of section 7, which we may be unable to fathom. Having provided that every destitute person is to be relieved where he is, as if he were settled there, until he can be lawfully removed therefrom,—they add, "or until he ceases by other lawful means to be destitute therein." The *un*lawfulness of ceasing to be destitute is, we confess, a possibility that never struck us before; the only unlawful means of ceasing to be destitute we can think of, is that of thieving: in which case this clause clearly forces the parish to maintain the thief; for it is expressly directed that the pauper shall be relieved until he ceases to be destitute by lawful means. This, and lawful removal, are the only terms on which relief is allowed to stop. It may be objected that this is hyper-critical. We think not. The ignorance and inattention manifested in the style in which our statutes are constantly drawn up and passed into laws, are growing sources of perplexity to educated lawyers, and of hardship and expense to the country. To express plainly what one means is really not a matter of vast difficulty, and words fit for the purpose are neither scarce nor costly; this being the case, there is no excuse for illiteracy or obscurity in Acts of Parliament.

Section 7 having thus provided that paupers are to be relieved till lawfully removed, &c., section 8 enacts that they may be removed, i. e. to where they are settled, subject to provisions; and then comes section 9, which provides that they are not to be removed to where they are not settled, except as excepted. Then there are seven "provisions," leading on to section 8, and the "exception" to section 9 (relating to Irish and Scotch paupers) is tossed away into section 28! We see no reason why these three awkward sections should not be condensed into two simple ones; the first merely providing that all persons whilst destitute in any parish shall be relieved therein; the second declaring them to be removable to their legal settlement, and not elsewhere, except as hereinafter otherwise provided. Then let the provisions for irremovability follow, with the 28th section, relating to Irish paupers.

Now, as to the provisions for irremovability, those which relate to married women and children seem unobjectionable; and although No. 5, providing that widows who were with their husbands at their deaths where they (their husbands) were not settled, shall not be removable afterwards for life, is a somewhat novel step, it bears evidence of too much humanity upon the face of it to be quarrelled with. The 6th provision, that persons relieved in cases of accident and illness shall not be removable until they have been chargeable for forty days, is, we incline upon the whole to think, a salutary alteration in the law. Hitherto the test was intent to reside;—if a person was not a passer-by, that is, casual poor, he was removable as soon as chargeable in all cases except relief by vaccination,(a) which does not constitute parochial relief by 5 & 6 Vict. c. 32, s. 2. It is certainly right to diminish removals for merely temporary causes, and we think this provision a step in the right direction. A man with a large family was for a few days chargeable on the score of illness, was then removed, though before the actual removal he was able to work, but went back again to the same parish he came from the day afterwards; an expense of some pounds was incurred, without any advantage to either parish beyond the trifling amount of the pauper's medical relief. These follies will be prevented by provision 6.

This brings us to the provision whereby "no person who has resided the five years last preceding in any parish, and has ordinarily maintained himself in or near thereto as a labourer, artificer, mechanic, servant, or tradesman, and has not been convicted of felony or misdemeanor, and has not during such five years been removed from such parish under a warrant of removal, shall be liable to be removed." Seeing that this is a measure which introduces a totally new law, it is not unreasonable to wish that it had been a little more explicitly worded. What these five years are to precede is left wholly to parochial imagination; whether it is to precede chargeability, warrant of removal, or actual removal, is alike doubtful. Next, what is meant by "ordinarily" maintaining himself? Does it admit of intervals of days, weeks, or months? There is no sort of standard given or implied what ordinarily is intended to mean; and it is perfectly certain that the minds of justices at quarter sessions will be at liberty to revel in full latitude from a bare majority of days up to constant employment. We shall have a precious conflict of decisions on this one word alone; and another plentiful crop will probably arise on the interpretation of what is "near to" a parish. Is six miles near? Is four? Is three? Is two? Who can tell? Supposing some bold spirit at quarter sessions pitches upon a given figure, and defines a distance; the next case exceeds it by 100 yards; will the winning parish venture into the Queen's Bench upon the point? Here, then, are three perplexing ambiguities in a line and a quarter! The provision goes on to provide for "labourers, artificers, mechanics, servants, or tradesmen," making no provision for parish clerks, schoolmasters, farmers, land measurers, literary men, reporters, and some other classes of persons, which the least care and attention would have shewn do not fall under any of the above designations. It is then provided that no residence in any prison, &c. shall be either a portion or an interruption of the said five years. How it can help being one or the other it is difficult to understand; the meaning of this clause is, we presume, that the five years shall be reckoned exclusively of time spent in prison, &c. but without regard to temporary interruptions thus caused in the continuity of employment. It can scarcely mean that, let the abode in prison, &c. be ever so long—ten years, for instance—it shall be no interruption of a five years' employment in the midst of which it may have fallen: and yet this would result from the wording of the clause, and is within its strict literal construction.

But let us reflect for a moment on the tendency of a law of which the effect seems to have received little more care than its wording. The only good it can possibly do is to diminish the effect of the birth-removal section; and, in as far as provision 7 is calculated to restrict section 3, it is entitled to our esteem: the most useful part of the Act is certainly that which abates its removing powers. This provision lessens removals for the sake of change, and has the merit of counteracting so much evil; but on what conceivable principle are people who have resided and worked for five years in a parish to be picked out for irremovability? there being no vestige of such a ground of settlement in existing law, or precedent for such a pretext of irremovability. Relief of parishes can form no pretence for it, inasmuch as it will burden numbers of them with anti-Malthusian interlopers, who have been allowed to stay in such parishes when they might have been got rid of, simply because they have hitherto been removable as soon as chargeable. We may instance squatters on commons, who often locate themselves wrongfully, and whom this provision affixes upon the parishes wherever they have ordinarily had work to maintain themselves. Be it also observed, that no occasional chargeability will render these people removable, for relief is specified as being neither a portion nor an interruption of the five years. If a reason were to be sought in humanity to the poor, themselves, it would ill apply to such paupers as had grown old in their abodes under the protection of some existing settlement, numbers of whom are shut out by the terms of provision 7 from all protection under it; for many of them have not maintained themselves for five years last past by their own labour, but have been for years past maintained by the parish, or by their own families. As far as it is possible to understand this Bill, all these poor old infirm paupers will be exiled to the parishes of their birth whenever they do not happen to have been removed by warrant of removal to where they are; and this, although they may have gained a settlement a dozen times during a life's abode there. We know of a pauper nearly ninety years old who will be thus removed. He was born elsewhere, but has resided sixty years where he is! But the young vagabond who has ordinarily maintained himself where he first came as an interloper, and has been sometimes in prison and sometimes out—labourer, poacher, and thief by turns,(a) is, in virtue of his talismanic residence of five years, invested with the privilege of irremovability and the dignity and degree of resident inhabitant, though his residence may consist of a moiety of a bed or litter, at a rental of sixpence a week. This provision omits, therefore, to provide for those who most require the protection which it extends to those who need it least. It may possibly be, that the agricultural interest have an especial interest in this provision; hoping that it may prevent the return upon their hands of the country-born denizens of the manufacturing districts. If so, we believe that such hopes will be disappointed. The residence must have been continuous in one parish, and in large towns, where there are many parishes, and also where work so frequently fluctuates, a large portion of such workpeople change their abodes oftener than once in five years. In those districts, moreover, they who have been the longest stationary are the least likely to become chargeable, and if so, the clause effects no other benefit than would have resulted without it. Opinions, we believe, widely differ as to the number of persons who will be rendered irremovable by this clause. If it affects a large portion, then the provisions for removing the minority appear causeless, and in many cases inhumane. If it affects only a few, the reason for this troublesome exception is the less accountable. Be this as it may, we must leave this quinquennial-residence-industrial-maintenance device to the sober judgment of those two happy classes; the one who will have the task of construing and executing, and the other who will enjoy the pleasure of paying for it.

By the terms of section 28, Irish, Scotch, and other non-English paupers all fall within this provision.

Section 10 provides that if the overseers of any parish, by writing under the hands of any two or more of them, signed in presence of a justice of the peace and certified under his hand, admit that any person is settled in such parish, removal shall take place thereupon. This appears at first sight an excellent mode of removing without the costs of a formal examination and order, but it is by no means certain that the trouble of convincing the receiving parish and the formal admission before the justice, may not amount to nearly the same thing as obtaining an order on the usual ex parte evidence, to which it is always in the power of the receiving parish to assent. Upon the whole it may be well to give the option presented in this section, but the value of it is inconsiderable, removals being very easily effected at present.

4. EVIDENCE AND EXAMINATION.

Birth being the standard settlement under the new Bill, it was obviously requisite to remove the difficulties by which proof of it has been hitherto beset. By section 4, the register is henceforth to suffice for this purpose. If the pauper was born since the passing of the last Registration Act, in the seventh year of the last reign, the usual registrar's certificate of the birth will be required. For some years to come, few cases will fall under this class. For all paupers born before that period, the only evidence of the birth settlement is to be the register of baptism. Prior to the late Act, the old parish registers have only professed to register baptisms. It is notorious, that in many cases children have been baptized in other than the parishes where they were born; frequently because the churches of such parishes were more conveniently placed, or because other members of the same family were born or married there. For these sufficient reasons, entries of baptisms have not been held admissible as proofs of birth settlements. The new Bill is to render them so for the future, although it is clear that they can really prove nothing more than the act of baptism. To facilitate the proof still further, copies of the entry are admissible, if certified by the officiating minister, "the parish clerk, or any churchwarden," and witnessed by one witness. As every parish must have an officiating minister, the reason for these additional certifying functionaries is one of the superfluities of this Bill in petty details, which make its omissions in important matters so conspicuous. The last clause of this section wisely provides that the certificate shall be primâ facie evidence of the birth-place, "unless the contrary appear on the face thereof." This is considerate; having made evidence of one thing evidence of another, they very discreetly refrain from making entries prove what they contradict. Whether parishes will be permitted to rebut this primâ facie evidence or not is left to be guessed at. The term primâ facie evidence certainly implies as much; but implications of course in law are apt to be delusive.

We intend to sum up these articles with a sketch of what the Bill ought to have done and has failed to do; but we cannot refrain from remarking, that when so many cases in the Queen's Bench have shewn the uncertainty of the rules of evidence as applied especially to the proof of chargeability, a clause might naturally have been expected to settle some uniform mode of proving what it is necessary in all cases to prove, and about which recent decisions have caused much doubt.

We must defer further comment on this Bill until next week. In the meantime let us again invite the especial and prompt attention of those concerned in this branch of law to its nature and tendency. We shall, moreover, be obliged by suggestions and opinions of any persons whose practical experience may give them value.

POOR LAW PRACTICE.

OVERSEER.

1. SUPPLYING GOODS TO A BOARD OF GUARDIANS.

April 24, 1844.

Overseer of ———: Stated, that previous to his appointment as overseer he had been in the habit of supplying the board of guardians of the union in which his parish was situate, with stationery, and he had been also employed in printing for them. Inquired, whether he could legally continue to do so whilst holding the office of overseer?

Ans. The 55th Geo. 3, c. 137, s. 6, imposes a penalty on any overseer who supplies "for his own profit, any goods, materials, or provisions for the use of any workhouse or otherwise for the support and maintenance of the poor." The commissioners are disposed to consider that stationery and printed documents supplied to the guardians of a union, being auxiliary to the administration of relief, and probably used by the guardians at the workhouse, would be held to be within the words of the statute referred to above: at any rate the same objections in principle apply to the furnishing of such goods by an overseer as of articles used for more immediate consumption by the paupers themselves. The commissioners think you might therefore be exposed to the penalties enacted by the 55th Geo. 3, c. 137, if you continue to supply the goods in question during your year of office.

2. RECOVERY OF CONTRIBUTIONS FROM OVERSEERS.

April 22, 1844.

Clerk of Great Boughton Union: Stated, that the townships of Great Boughton, Kelsall, and Burrow (Little), within the Great Boughton Union, had neglected to pay their contributions for the last quarter, and the board of guardians had directed application to be made to the justices, to recover the amounts from the respective overseers. The overseer for Great Boughton, who had been in office two years, positively refused to pay; and alleged that, as he was no longer overseer, payment could not be enforced; he had not, however, passed his accounts, and the auditor had been requested not to pass them without production of the treasurer's receipt for the contribution.

Ans. The commissioners are of opinion that the guardians of Great Boughton Union cannot now avail themselves of remedial proceedings, for the recovery of contributions, against the late overseers of any parish; who, being no longer in office, would have no power to reimburse themselves the sums levied on them. The commissioners think, however, that in such cases penal proceedings may be adopted; as the offence of disobedience to the guardians' order was completed by the overseers during their period of office; and the mere fact of their ceasing to hold such office, does not purge them of that offence, or oust the jurisdiction of the justices.

POOR-RATE.

1. APPORTIONMENT OF THE RATE BETWEEN AN OUTGOING AND INCOMING TENANT.

Feb. 23, 1844.

Clerk of the Fylde Union—Stated, that throughout the whole of the Fylde Union, which was principally an agricultural district, it had time immemorial been the custom for terms of occupation in farms to end on the 2nd day of February with respect to the land, and on the 1st day of May following with respect to the farmhouse and buildings, and one close of land or other small proportion of the farm for outlet for cattle. The reason for this distinction in the time of quitting farms, was owing to a great proportion of the fodder (the produce of the farm) not being consumed by the 2nd of February, and the inconvenience of removing the fodder, as well as the injury which would be done to the farm by such removal would be very great. The parochial year, previous to the passing of the Poor Law Amendment Act, generally ended at Easter, and in that district nominally on the 5th of April. The custom of paying poor-rates between the off-going and on-coming tenants, for the quarter ending 5th of April, was invariably one-third of the rate by the off-going and two-thirds thereof by the on-coming tenant, which was very near the proportion between the tenants for the time of occupation, pursuant to 17th Geo. 2, c. 38, s. 12. Since the passing of the Poor Law Amendment Act the parochial year had ended on the 25th March, being eleven days earlier; and the custom of paying poor-rates in the union, between the off-going and on-coming tenants, for the quarter ending 25th March, had been one-half of the rate by each party—being nearly an equitable proportion of the rate, pursuant to the statute, taking into consideration the eleven days before mentioned, and also the off-going tenant's liability to a proportion of a subsequent rate, for the farm-house buildings, and outlet. The magistrates of the district were of different opinions respecting the proportions of the rate, for the quarter ending 25th March, to be paid between the off-going and on-coming tenants of a farm; some deciding that the rate for the whole quarter must be paid; others, that the proportion last before-mentioned only ought to be paid—thus placing the collectors in a situations of difficulty. Requested the commissioners to advise how the collectors ought to proceed in the matter.

Ans.—The case referred to is one to which the provision in the 17th Geo. 2, c. 38, as to the division of the rate between the out-going and the in-coming tenant, appears to be applicable. But the proportion of rate payable in any such case (where there is any dispute between the parties concerned) is to be ascertained by the justices. The matter is therefore one entirely in the discretion of the justices. But as the opinion of the commissioners has been asked on the subject, they are not prepared to say that the division which, since the passing of the Poor Law Amendment Act, has been made, is, under the circumstances, an unfair division.

2. EXCUSAL OF POOR-RATE.

March 6, 1844.

Auditor of Lymington Union—Inquired as to the mode in which the payment of Poor-rates could be legally excused.

Ans.—All the rateable property in a parish should be assessed in every poor-rate, and no person assessed can be lawfully excused from payment of the rate on account of poverty, except in accordance with the provisions of the 54 Geo. 3, c. 170, s. 11. Under that section, the justices alone have power to excuse the payment; and such excusal can be granted only upon the application of the party rated (though the commissioners believe such application need not be made in person), and with the consent of the overseers of the parish or the guardians of the union. Some doubt prevails as to whether the parish officers are still competent to give such consent, or whether they are not superseded in that function by the board of guardians; and while such doubt remains, it must rest, of course, with the justices themselves to determine whose consent they will receive.

3. LEVYING A SECOND RATE WHILST THE FIRST IS IN COLLECTION.

March 22, 1844.

Clerk of Stoke-upon-Trent parish—Inquired whether the overseers could levy a second rate whilst the first was in collection, there being some small sums remaining unpaid, which could be recovered only by summons, or by allowing time for payment.

Ans.—Where a poor-rate has been for the most part collected, the commissioners think that the fact of its not being immediately recoverable in some few instances would not prevent the making of a new rate, supposing a necessity to arise for obtaining further funds, and provided that the two rates be not concurrent rates, i. e. laid for the same period of time. The schedule annexed to the 6 & 7 Wm. 4, c. 96 (Form of Rate), which requires the "arrears" to be brought forward, clearly contemplates the case of a former rate being partially uncollected when a new one is made; and the 43 Eliz. c. 2, s. 4, provides for the recovery not only of the current rate, but likewise of "all arrearages."

THE LAWYER.

Summary.

We have given a somewhat copious abstract of the opinions of the Judges in Gray's case, as they contain so much information respecting the history and nature of peremptory challenge, which cannot be easily obtained, and are therefore deserving of being recorded in our columns, although the practice is clearly settled in England.

THE LAWS OF FRANCE.

No. I.

Wills made in France by an Englishman—Locus regit actum.

Our correspondent, who furnished the full and interesting report of the dispute between the French Bar and the President of the Cour Royale, enables us to lay before our readers the first of a series of articles on such points in the laws and judicial system of France as may be most useful and interesting to an English lawyer. The great increase of intercourse between the two countries renders some knowledge of the subject the more valuable. The following letter contains a report of a case upon wills made in France by an Englishman :—

SIR,—A curious and interesting case came before the Tribunal de première Instance de Paris on the 8th of August, and being a novel question in the law of nations, I have thought you might consider it worthy of insertion in your columns. The 1 Vict. c. 26 declares the will of any English subject not made in the presence of two witnesses null and void. It remained to be proved whether this statute could be applied to a will made in France by an Englishman, notwithstanding the rule locus regit actum.

Mr. Quartin Dilley, doctor and naturalist, died in Abyssinia, 3rd January, 1841. His heirs were—his father, Mr. Quartin, an Englishman; his mother, Quartin's legitimate wife, Marie Henriquez de Cabrera, a Spaniard; one sister of age, two sisters and a brother, minors. Before leaving Paris, where he had been studying, Richard Quartin had deposited at a notary's a will drawn up by himself (olographe), (a) dated 31st January, 1839, by which he gives half of his property to his two sisters, Marie and Charlotte, then at a school at Picpus, and the other half to his brother and sister, who had remained in Portugal, leaving to his father and mother a life interest in the latter half. The eldest sister, Marie de Carmis, died 11th September, 1842, leaving also a testament olographe made in France, naming her sister Charlotte her residuary legatee. These two wills of Quartin Dilley and of Marie Quartin are the subject of the present suit.

The inventory has proved that the bulk of the property left by these two wills consists of rents and personal property, and Mr. Quartin claims it not only as guardian and manager of his wife and children's property, but also as sole heir, according to the English laws, of his children, who have died without issue.

Mr. Quartin has accordingly summoned M. Lebon, recorder of the court, and provisional administrator of the inheritances of the said children, to surrender to him the title-deeds and writings of the two wills.

But can these two wills of Richard Quartin Dilley and of Marie de Carmis Quartin be held valid in France?

Mr. Quartin's advocate maintained that the wills were void. They were olographe testaments, and, according to the English laws, an olographe will is only legal when it has been drawn up in the presence of two witnesses, and these said wills had been made without witnesses. Moreover, it is a case of personal property, and the statutum personale is applicable.

The advocate contended that the said olographe wills were invalid in England, and would not be recognized by the Prerogative Court. He quoted the 1 Vict. c. 26, which declares that "all wills must be made in the presence of two witnesses." From a declaration of Mr. Jostling, registrar of the Prerogative Court of Canterbury, he read as follows: "After having most attentively examined the case, and submitted it to Mr. Dyneley, one of my brother registrars, I am, like him, of opinion that the principle locus regit actum is not applicable when there exists such a positive statute as that of 1 Vict. c. 26. This statute is applicable to all the subjects of her British Majesty, whether in England or elsewhere."

From the fact that an olographe will of an Englishman in England would not be valid if it did not bear the signature of two witnesses, the advocate inferred that the same will ought to be considered void in France; that the rule locus regit actum was not applicable in the present instance, but that there was reason to apply the rule of the statutum personale, which follows the foreigner everywhere with regard to his personal property.

Besides, the rule locus regit actum is only applicable to documents executed before public functionaries, not to those executed by individuals privately.

Upon the representations of the Procureur du Roi, (b) the Court, at a previous sitting, had ordered that before giving a judgment, the minors, Quartin, should be represented in the Court, and appointed a special guardian to the said minors, to defend them against the demands of Quartin, postponing the suit for eight days.

At the second sitting, Quartin's advocate again discussed the question of right, and, in support of his opinion, quoted that of the barrister attached to the English embassy. He mentioned, also, the decision given in the case of an English lady, of the name of Popkins, whose will had been signed by two witnesses, and had been recognized as valid by the Prerogative Court of Canterbury. Two codicils following the signatures of the witnesses had been annulled because they came after the signatures of the two witnesses, and thus failed in the requisite condition.

But the advocate of the special guardian represented Mr. Quartin's father as a man eager to appropriate to himself the fortune that his son has insured by his will to his brother and sisters. He maintained that the principle locus regit actum is an absolute rule; and admitting the statute of 1 Vict. to be explicit and positive, he contended that French judges ought not to be influenced by the manner in which a will made in France might be regarded by English judges. It was sufficient for them to know that the will made in France was made conformably to the French law.

The Procureur du Roi then pronounced against the claims of Mr. Quartin, and

The Court delivered the following judgment :

"Concerning the supposed invalidity of the wills :

"Inasmuch as it is generally admitted as the law of nations, that the formality of acts is necessarily governed by the laws, customs, and usages of the countries where they occur :

"That this principle, required by the force of circumstances, applied without restriction, protects all documents, whatever they be, provided the place of their execution is undoubted :

"Inasmuch as it is proved, and moreover not contested, that these two said wills emanated from the hands of testators, are properly written, dated, and signed, fulfilling in this respect all the conditions essential to their validity, according to the Code Civil, under the authority of which they were made :

"Inasmuch as Quartin maintains and demands the invalidity of these wills merely on the plea that the suitors, as English subjects, were incapable in France of making an olographe will, the statutes of their country only recognizing wills duly attested :

"Inasmuch as, supposing that in England one cannot make an olographe will, the principle would not be applicable in France; that the claim, moreover, presented in the name of Quartin rests on a confusion of the rules relative to the capacity of the individual and of the rules concerning the intrinsic formalities, the nature and character of the acts :

"That if it is true that the personal statute (statutum personale) follows the person everywhere, it is equally incontestable that it is merely to determine that person's condition, the extent and limits of his rights and capacity, and whether he is of age or a minor, but the personal statute has nothing to do with the form and character of acts which have taken place in a country, the laws and statutes of which have determined the means of accomplishing those acts :

"That it is easily understood that all appertaining to the substantial elements—the solemnity, nature, and form of contracts, belongs exclusively to the laws of the country where they are made, or to which the foreigner, as denizen, must conform, if he wishes his rights, and his exercise of them, to be protected by those laws ;

"Otherwise, it might happen that the foreigner might be unable to accomplish in France such or such an intention, authorized only according to the customs of his country, upon the fulfilment of some special formality, prohibited by our laws :

"That it follows from these principles, that these two wills, conformable to the dispositions of the Code Civil, which governs them according to the rule locus regit actum, are valid in their form, that it is, in consequence, expedient to inquire what effect they will produce :

"Inasmuch as, differing from our laws, the English statutes do not compel any reserve to be made in favour of fathers and mothers, and leave to children the entire disposal of their property; as an English subject, the deceased Dilley Quartin might have disposed of all his fortune in favour of his sister or of strangers :

"Inasmuch as the property left by the said Dilley Quartin, in France, is only moveable property; that in principle moveables follow the condition and estate of the individual :

"Touching the claims of Quartin on the said property in the name of, and as legal administrator of, his children's property :

"Inasmuch as, according to the English statutes, the father, during marriage, has the administration of the property of his children who are under age, that upon this plea Quartin is entitled to the property belonging to his daughter :

"Inasmuch, however, as the application of these principles depends upon circumstances, and, above

(a) In France we have three kinds of wills—1st. Le testament olographe, which consists in a declaration of the testator's wishes, written, dated, and signed by himself. 2nd. Le testament dans la forme mystique, which is the declaration of the testator's wishes, written either by himself or another, signed by him and deposited by him, under cover, in the hands of a notary, who, in the presence of six witnesses, seals the envelope, on which is written that it contains the will of such a one, and the whole is signed by the testator, the notary, and the witnesses. 3rd. The testament authentique, in which the testator publicly dictates his last wishes to a notary, in presence of four witnesses; the document is signed by the testator, and remains with the notary, or if he is unable to sign, the fact is mentioned, and an additional witness is called.—See Code Civil, 967-1001.

(b) At each Court there is an Attorney-General (Procureur du Roi), supported by substitutes (substituts), who are bound to be present at all judgments, to enforce the observance of the laws, and to be the official defenders of the absent, and those unable to appear, of minors and married women, of the state, and of all public establishments. To them, also, are intrusted proceedings against crimes and offences.

all, upon the children's interests, which becomes the sole consideration which ought to influence one:

"Inasmuch as the intention of the testators was to leave to Marie de Carmis Quartin the means to complete her education, and to assure her future prospects at the same time:

"Inasmuch as Quartin, the father, is only accidentally living in Paris; where, on the contrary, his daughter is to remain to complete her education:

"That is, accordingly to her interest, that the property should remain in the hands of a third:

"The Court recognizes the validity of the two wills, and rejects the claims of Quartin, the father."

This judgment will be appealed against, and referred to the Cour Royale, although it appears to us perfectly clear, and given in accordance to the strictest rules of equity. I do not allude to the fears the Court might have entertained for the safety of the children's property, had it passed into the hands of the father, but to the legality of the question; for our laws recognize the validity of all acts done in a foreign country, either by foreigners or by Frenchmen, provided they have been done conformably to the rules of the country; it is the application of the rule locus regit actum, which has no affinity whatever to the statutum personale; the former regulates the form of acts—the latter, the personal estate. There is, therefore, every reason to believe the Court of Appeal will confirm the judgment given by the Court of First Instance.

There are few legislations in Europe which protect the rights of minors and those incapacitated from defending themselves so much as ours, and the difference which is here shewn between the French and English laws, with regard to the rights of succession, renders this judgment interesting and worthy of attention. In England the testator can dispose of all his fortune as he pleases; but in France he is compelled to leave the bulk of his property to his children, and to his father and mother, and if he has no children, his brothers and sisters are co-heirs with the father and mother.

I will soon send you an article on the rights of Englishmen in France,

And remain, Sir, yours truly, N. T.

LEGAL INTELLIGENCE.

THE ECCLESIASTICAL COMMISSION.

The following circular has been issued to the several bishops by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for England:—

"Resolved, That, until further public notice, the published resolutions of the commissioners, relating to grants out of their funds, be suspended; except in the case of local claims upon tithes, &c., and except also as hereinafter mentioned.

"That application for grants in augmentation of income be entertained in the case of new churches already built, or in course of building, or the whole means of building which shall have been provided on or before the 1st day of August instant, in expectation of aid from the commissioners: and that all such applications, if made before the 1st of October next, be respectively taken into consideration as early as the state of the funds will allow.

"That a copy of these resolutions be transmitted to each bishop, with a request for the earliest information in his power as to the probable number of such applications in his diocese."

The reason for this is apparent by the latter part of the following paper, recently laid before the House of Lords by the commissioners, in compliance with an order, on the motion of Lord Clanricarde, for a return of all sums in their hands not appropriated to any particular purpose:

"The Ecclesiastical Commissioners for England are unable, for the following reasons, to return any sums, now under their control, as not appropriated to any particular purpose, in respect either of the episcopal fund, or of the fund applicable to the augmentation of small livings.

"1. The episcopal fund is formed by fixed contributions from the larger bishoprics, out of which, fixed annual payments are made, in augmentation of the incomes of the smaller.

"An annual surplus of about 6,000*l*., which, according to the calculation made at the date of the Episcopal Act in 1836, is estimated as likely to arise, when the debtor and creditor sides of the account shall both be in full operation, by vacancies having occurred in all the paying and all the receiving sees, is liable to be varied in amount, either by increase or diminution, upon septennial revision of the episcopal payments and receipts; the first of which revisions is now about to take place, upon new returns of income made this year.

"The contribution from larger sees already vacated having hitherto exceeded in amount the augmentations required for smaller sees, there has been and still is an annual surplus, amounting, at present, to about the same sum of 6,000*l*.

"This surplus has, from time to time, been nearly exhausted in providing episcopal houses of residence; and the present actual balance consists of a sum in Exchequer-bills, and certain moneys due from one of the contributing bishops, amounting together to about 12,000*l*.

"But neither this balance, nor the existing surplus annual income, can be said to be unappropriated, because by further vacancies among the receiving sees occurring before other contributing sees fall vacant, not only may the annual surplus at any time be absorbed, but the whole annual receipts may become insufficient to meet the increased claims thus arising upon the fund; and this contingency alone renders it impossible yet to consider any sum in hand as unappropriated.

"As to the common fund, applicable to the augmentation of poor livings, the circumstance of this being its primary object would, in the present condition of the church, prevent the commissioners from feeling themselves at liberty to return any sum as unappropriated; even had the whole revenues, prospectively placed at their disposal by the Cathedral Acts, become already available.

"But these revenues being dependent upon the falling in of cathedral preferments, &c. the annual income increases only gradually; and it has been the invariable policy of the commissioners to afford the greatest amount of relief in their power to the existing spiritual destitution, by pledging this growing income, in perpetuity from time to time, as it accrues.

"The extent to which this principle has been carried appears from the list of 562 benefices and churches already augmented by the commissioners, which has recently been printed; and it results from their having done so much that a necessity will arise in the current year for supplying the other demands upon the fund, including the augmentations of archdeaconries out of their stock; the remainder of which may be considered as pledged to meet benefactions towards providing houses of residence for the poor clergy.

"The commissioners are, therefore, also unable to return any unappropriated surplus in respect of this fund. "By order of the Board,

"CHARLES KNIGHT MURRAY,

"Treasurer and Sec.

SIR WILLIAM FOLLETT.—It was with much pleasure we announced last week that intelligence received from the Continent indicated a considerable improvement in the health of this gentleman, whose estimation by the public has made him as much respected as the appreciation by his friends has made him beloved. The frequent recurrence of illness at a period when his high standing, so honestly earned, has apparently opened to him a wide career of usefulness, has been a source of much regret. The origin of his indisposition is of a singular character, and has not, we believe, hitherto been made known. While at school, in Devonshire, on a fine autumnal day, when the evident approach of a gloomier season makes us appreciate more highly the genial sunshine of present enjoyment, three youths sallied forth on a school-holiday for a long ramble in the woods and copses which deck that most picturesque of all the southern counties of England. A plentiful supply of black berries, with which the hedgerows abounded, delighted the palates of the strollers; and present appetite having been allayed, if not satiated, the hat of one of the party was devoted to the accumulated store, and their steps were turned homeward. An accidental separation in the ramble left the one in charge of the commissariat department to pursue his journey alone; and he, to beguile the way and lighten his load, made serious inroads on the stock in reserve. The result was, that poor Follett, for he it was, fell under an attack of illness so severe, that his removal from school became necessary; and although careful nursing and the devoted attention of his relatives enabled him at length to resume his studies at home, and subsequently to remove to college, it was long before his health was re-established, and his constitution never appears to have recovered wholly from the unfortunate circumstance.—Berwick and Kelso Warder.

WINTER ASSIZE.

ALL our professional readers who are in any way connected with criminal business will recollect the serious inconvenience that was inflicted last year by the delay on the part of the Government in announcing their intention of causing a Winter Assize to be holden, and the uncertainty and confusion of the arrangements when they were made. We take therefore an opportunity thus early of drawing attention to the subject, that it may as soon as possible be determined on in one way or another, that it shall not again occur that jurors and witnesses must be obliged to leave their homes on Christmas day, as it was the case of many who attended at Winchester on the last occasion. And we mention this merely as one of numerous similar instances.

Meanwhile we wish to remind those whose duty it is to prepare the recognizances, that the usual recognizance to appear at "the next assizes and general gaol delivery," will not be sufficient to compel the attendance of the parties. This was distinctly held by Maule, J. in Reg. v. Walker (Cox Crim. Law Cas. Ver. Rep. p. 14), where a witness who did not appear was not allowed to be called upon his recognizances.

ADVERTISING AND SHAM LAWYERS.

IN noticing some of these two classes in a recent number, we had our suspicions respecting the right of some of them to the titles they assumed. We do not mean positively to assert that there may not be some foundation for them, but we think it right to inform our readers that on reference to the Law Lists of 1835, 1841, and 1844, we find no Thomas Lord mentioned, several of whose circulars have been forwarded to us from different parts of the country. Not having by us at this moment a complete series of the Law List, we cannot say how often his name does appear; but in 1837 we find that name with the following additions:—"Thames Association Office, for protecting small vessels against damage by steamers; foreign law agent for recovering foreign debts, and transmitting deeds to all places on the continent; and parliamentary agent." A multiplicity of titles has not, it seems, been favourable to Mr. Lord's success; and if the law societies bestir themselves, and it should be found on inquiry that he is not now a solicitor, this attempt may prove his last.

Nor do we see any Mr. George Lewis, of 4, Barnard's Inn, in the Law List of this year. But a copy of a letter sent by him now lies before us, in which he terms himself solicitor.

The Mr. W. Clarke, of Oxford, whom we noticed before, seems to possess a degree of impudence which almost excites our admiration for its intensity. In one way, at least, he is determined to surpass, and few will wish to be his rivals. At the corner of a long crooked lane leading from Holywell to New College-lane, Oxford, and which is known by the euphonious appellation of Hell, may be seen a sign-board to inform the unfortunate that they may avail themselves of the assistance (!) of "William Clarke, solicitor, conveyancer, attorney of the City, Sheriff's, and County Courts, a commissioner for taking affidavits;" and then follows a direction to his office. In his advertisement in the Oxford Chronicle he is satisfied with the more general address, "Holywell, Oxford," thinking, and perhaps rightly, that if any one think it prudent, lured on by the advertisement, to go in search of him, he will not be staggered by the "signboard."

Before quitting this painful subject, we wish to refer our readers to an advertisement in another column, containing the names of the Provisional Committee of the Legal Protective Association. That some efficient means are needed to put a stop to these practices, all admit; the how, and the by whom, it is to be done, is a more difficult question. We shall watch their progress with great interest.

THE CRITIC.

New Books.

Outlines of a Plan for adapting the Machinery of the Public Funds to the Transfer of Real Property. By Robert Wilson. London, 1844. Blenkarn, 19, Chancery-lane.

This pamphlet is dedicated to the Law Amendment Society, and the sweeping changes proposed by it are so startling, that none but those seriously engaged in the consideration of the existing evils of our system will have inclination to examine their practicability. Such persons, however,—and their number is daily increasing,—will find in this ingenious pamphlet much to excite reflection, although we cannot say that they will be convinced. The author, indeed, who has evidently spent much time and thought upon the subject, and is, therefore, cognizant of its difficulty, will not be surprised at this result. A full examination at the present moment would far exceed the space at our command, and it is only by slow degrees that all the bearings of such a change are, or can be, mastered.

All admit, that from the present system of retrospective deduction of title flow serious expense and inconvenience. Still, the recollection that this system has arisen in consequence of the complicated arrangements rendered necessary by the state of society, and that the Legislature has frequently failed, most specially when attempting to enforce a theoretical remedy, as in the case of the Statute of Uses, make us pause before we admit that it would not again fail, as long as the feelings and wishes of mankind oppose the end sought.

Mr. Wilson considers the existence of a Theory of Representation—a simple title representing subordinate interests—in the case of property in the funds, shews that it may be advantageously substituted for the complex theory of estates in the case of real property; we are to have "land warrants," transferable, almost like dock warrants—no conveyances—no minute examination of titles—no abstracts in "lengthened sweetness long drawn out;" but all is to be managed under a vast Government Registration of Estates and Transfers Board.

To quote his own words:—

"It is proposed in the following pages to prove, that if derivative interests in real property were provided for according to the 'theory of representation,' instead of according to the 'theory of estates,' our present retrospective deduction of title might be superseded by registration on the continental principle, divested of judicial interference. In support of this proposition, it will be necessary first to explain at some length how the 'theory of estates' works at present; then to shew the working of the opposite 'theory of representation,' in the machinery of the public funds; a branch of the subject which will lead us to point out, in passing, that an imperfect principle of representation once held a prominent place in the law of real property itself. An attempt will next be made to prove that the transferable symbols of property which produce such beneficial effects in various familiar instances are founded on similar principles. Our argument will next proceed to apply the theory of representation to real property; and in so doing to observe on the extreme simplicity to which it might reduce the ordinary transactions of sale or mortgage, without affecting the security or efficiency of family settlements, or involving the abolition of feudal tenures. It will also be shewn that the same fundamental principle might lead to a perfectly simple system of registration; without disclosing equitable mortgages: and that by its further development even subordinate titles, such as those to leases, might be divested of much unnecessary affirmative proof; and an efficient substitute might incidentally supply the place of declaratory actions, now so much wanted and so imperfectly replaced by other remedies."

To follow him through the details would take up far too much time, but the machinery he partly describes thus:—

"These would be, first, a government map of the country, to be revised periodically, on which each property would be distinguished by a number; secondly, a separate ledger account kept for each property, or number, in a metropolitan registry; and, thirdly, a transferable symbol representing each property, or number, and manifesting the title to it. It would not, however, be necessary that this machinery should be provided for the whole country at once; it might be applied, in the first instance, to a town or a county, and be extended by degrees. A government establishment of moderate dimensions might survey the different parts of the country successively, within a period of twenty or thirty years, and then recommence the circuit."

Austria, Prussia, and Bavaria, it seems, have adopted a system of public registration as the medium of transfer, and we should much like to have full information, first, as to the state of landed property when this was adopted, and next, how it works.

Now, upon a cursory consideration of this question, these objections present themselves:—The first is, how can such an alteration be made with due regard to existing interests and arrangements? How can the legal owners of all the property in the country be discovered? How can a commencement be made? The plan, to be useful, must be adopted universally. What an endless career for a commission! Then the expense would be enormous, and by whom it is to be paid? The benefits are problematical, and would the owners be willing to incur the expense? And can we say that it ought to come by way of direct taxation?

But suppose it effected—the infinite subdivision of properties and the ever-varying combinations of rights must quickly give rise to such a number of derivative interests, that the business of the courts of equity would be increased a hundred-fold, in protecting and enforcing them. Here, in fact, the root of the evil lies; and the analogy of funded property has, we think, been far too much relied on by Mr. Wilson. The analogy fails because of the difference of the subject-matter. To put it briefly, funded property, or money, is valuable only for itself—it has no traceable origin—it has no circumstances, in the philosophical sense of the word—it cannot be dealt with, let out, built on, planted, or altered. Each subdivision remains a whole of itself, unconnected with any other part. The equitable owner—the non-registered proprietor—wants nothing but the interest, and the principal at the expiration of the trust. It matters little, therefore, that the legal title is alone regarded. Landed property is, in a variety of respects, the very opposite, and not theoretically, but from its visible permanent nature.

These are some of the thoughts suggested by this pamphlet. It is, however, the fruit of much consideration, and deserves careful examination as an "outline." The author does not say that it is perfect, but only that it merits attention, and in this we quite agree with him.

The Metropolitan Buildings Act, 7 & 8 Vict. c. 84; with Notes and Cases explanatory of its Law and Practice. By George Tattersall, Surveyor, and Thomas Chambers, Barrister-at-law. London, 1844. E. Lumley.

Few more important Acts than the Metropolitan Buildings Act have been passed for many years. The direct way in which it interferes with every thing relating to buildings in the metropolis, and the power given to the Queen in Council to extend its operation to any place within twelve miles from Charing-cross, renders it most necessary for all persons selling or purchasing houses or planning their erection, to become somewhat acquainted with its details, or at least to have a ready manual at hand for reference. This edition exactly meets this necessity. It first contains an abstract of the Act, then the statute at full length, with notes and all the cases interspersed with the sections to which they refer. This is followed by an analytical digest of the rules of practice, legal and architectural, laid down by the Act, and a useful glossary of technical terms peculiar to building, which occur in it.

We extract the remarks of the editors upon some of the sections which are of more immediate importance to the professional reader.

On section 9, which relates to the modification of existing building contracts, and regulates future contracts, they observe:—

"This clause clearly sets aside all contracts for building according to plans not in conformity with the provisions of this Act. Where, however, such a contract, entered into in the form of an agreement to build, has been partially acted upon, and the plan thereby actually established; such plan may be carried out to completion, provided that all the foundations be laid before the 1st of January, 1845, and the building completed before the 1st of January, 1846, for it would then come under the definition (s. 2) of 'already built.' A lessee cannot, however, call upon his lessor to alter any building plan attached to a current contract, excepting insomuch as the same may have been rendered actually illegal by this Act; as in the case of the width of a street, &c.; and, moreover, a lessor so altering any plan as to conform with the provisions of this Act, would be protected from any actions at the suit of any one or more of his lessees for so doing. Nevertheless, neither lessor nor lessee will be justified under this Act in altering or deviating from any current contract in any respect other than to accommodate it strictly to the legal provisions of this Act.

The main difference between this section and the ensuing (s. 10) is, that this applies especially and solely to building contracts in actual operation, and to current building agreements; whereas the other (s. 10) provides for buildings in esse, or rebuildings contingent upon leases or agreements either actually existing, or which may hereafter be entered into."

On the tenth section, which refers to building-leases, or agreements for building-leases already in existence, they remark—

"This clause affects policies of insurance, inasmuch as they are contingent building agreements, and that this Act compels all new buildings to be rebuilt in conformity with its regulations. But as in no case can the insured call upon the insurer for more than the actual amount of the policy, the clause (if any) binding a lessee to rebuild in case of fire becomes a building agreement between a lessor and lessee, and as such is capable of modification or arrangement between the parties, as provided for by sections 9 and 10 of this Act."

On the 83rd & 84th sections, as to the awards of referees:—

"Taking this clause in connection with the succeeding, the effect and force of these awards appear to be as follows:—So soon as they are made, they bind not only the persons whose interests are immediately affected by them, but taking effect, as it were, on the property in dispute, they are conclusive against all who either have or may have any property therein. But if any document of this description be produced as evidence in any cause, it is not to be considered as conclusive evidence of the matters contained therein, so as to preclude the parties from disputing them; but only as primâ facie evidence, liable to be invalidated or rebutted by any other testimony brought forward."

A member of each of the Professions to whom will be mainly intrusted the interpretation and practical application of the provisions of this Act, having joined in preparing this edition, and having performed their duties carefully, it will, we trust, meet with the approbation it so well deserves. We would suggest, however, that the next edition should contain a general alphabetical index to assist those ignorant of the arrangement of the Act in their references.

Guide to Oratory; or, Whole Art of Public Speaking: containing the Principles and Adaptation of Logic, with the Rules and Etiquette of Debate; illustrated by Specimens of the Eloquence of the Ancients, and Selections from the Speeches of Fox, Burke, Pitt, Grattan, &c. &c. &c. London, 1844. Mitchell.

This little work contains much that is useful, although we do not expect that it will do what no treatise has ever yet been able to do—make an orator. Besides the positive information that it affords respecting modes of proceeding in the House of Commons, and the etiquette to be observed in debate, which all should be acquainted with, it points out the technical rules which have been laid down by writers on oratory, explains the different forms of arrangement, and gives some simple and clear rules which should be observed in reasoning.

To those who have never studied larger works on this subject it is calculated to be of great service; and our living masters of eloquence are so few in number, that we are glad to see any attempt to draw attention to this too much neglected art.

Lewis v. Hinton.

Dismissal of bill for want of prosecution—17th order of 1831—Practice—Cross notice of motion.

Where plaintiff obtains an order for a commission under the 17th amended order of 1831, and serves it upon the defendant, he is bound to proceed upon the provisions of the 17th order, although he subsequently abandons the commission; and if he fail to proceed in due time according to the terms of that order, the defendant is entitled to dismiss his bill for want of prosecution.

Penelope Lewis, the sole plaintiff in this suit, filed her bill, in 1842, against the defendant Hinton, who put in his answer on the 16th of November, 1842. On the 18th of July, 1843, the defendant, having moved to dismiss the bill for want of prosecution, the plaintiff gave an undertaking to speed. The plaintiff then obtained an order for a commission to examine witnesses within three weeks, and served it upon the defendant, according to the terms of the 17th order, but took no further steps therein. By the new practice the plaintiff was bound to give rules to examine witnesses and pass publication in Hilary Term, 1844. The plaintiff permitted Hilary Term to pass without taking any further step in the cause. The defendant, on the 5th of February last, moved before the Vice-Chancellor of England to dismiss the bill for want of prosecution; but his Honour being of opinion that the abandonment of the commission was a virtual abandonment of all proceedings under the 17th order, refused the motion. A similar motion was now made by the defendant by way of appeal before the Lord Chancellor. After the motion made on the 5th of February, the plaintiff had proceeded in Easter Term to give rules to examine witnesses and pass publication, and had set the cause down for hearing in Trinity Term.

James Parker, for the motion to dismiss, contended that it was now the settled construction of the 17th order that every thing under that order was consequential upon the plaintiff requiring a commission. If he does not require a commission, he may leave the defendant to bring the cause to a hearing (1 Dan. Chancery Practice, 378); but when he has obtained and served an order for a commission, he cannot abandon that order and place himself in the position of a party who has never issued a commission. In Rayson v. Lees (1 Keen's Reports, 14), it was held that the case was not withdrawn from the operation of the 17th order by the plaintiff's abandonment of the commission. This case was cited to the Vice-Chancellor of England, but he declined to admit its authority, or to alter the practice which had prevailed in his own court. Both the reason of the thing and the mischief of delay intended to be guarded against by the 16th and 17th orders, are with the decision of the Master of the Rolls.

The Lord Chancellor.—If the plaintiff had executed the commission, she must have given rules in Hilary Term; she cannot be in a better situation by not executing it. There seems to be no reason why, if she abandoned the commission, she should not, at all events, have passed publication in Hilary Term.

Anderdon and Parsons, contrà.—The latter part of the 17th order expressly provides for this case. (Rattenbury v. Fenton (6 Simons, 368). Where the plaintiff does not require a commission, the case falls under the old practice (Smith v. Oliver, 3 Mylne & Craig, 165); and it must equally do so where he abandons the commission. The defendant was too early in making his motion on the 5th of Feb. and ought to have waited until the expiration of the third term. (Whalley v. Pepper, 8 Simons, 203.)

Parker, in reply.

The Lord Chancellor.—I think, although the plaintiff did not prosecute the commission, she ought to have gone on to take all the other steps within the proper time. Having commenced a proceeding under the 17th order, she was bound to go on under it. She might neglect to execute the commission, but she must take the subsequent steps.

Anderdon then asked for a special order. The plaintiff had a bonâ fide intention of prosecuting the suit, and had erred from misconceiving the practice of the court, which was not uniform in all the branches of the court.

Parker.—Such an order cannot be made without a cross notice of motion. (Lyon v. Dumbell, 11 Vesey, 608; Steadman v. Ellis, 4 Maddock, 240.)

The Lord Chancellor.—Upon the main question decided there has been a difference of opinion between the Master of the Rolls and the Vice-Chancellor of England, and, therefore, I think I ought to put the plaintiff in such a position as, consistently with fairness to the defendant, will enable her to prosecute the suit.

Ordered, that on the plaintiff paying the costs of the application, publication stand enlarged until next Hilary Term.

Dalton v. Hayter.

Suspending proceedings pending appeal—Practice—Application to the judge before whom the cause was heard.

In this cause a demurrer by the defendant for want of equity had been overruled by Vice Chancellor Wigram, from whose decision the defendant had appealed. The plaintiff was now pressing for an answer, and the defendant moved for an order to stay proceedings until the appeal had been heard.

Wakefield, for the motion, said, that if the defendant was compelled to answer, his appeal would be useless.

Wood objected that, under the 46th order of April 1828, all such applications must be made, in the first instance, to the judge before whom the cause was heard. Motion refused with costs.

Attorney-General v. Rickards and Another.

Practice—Stay of proceedings pending appeal.

Wakefield and Kenyon moved for an order to restrain the relators in this information from proceeding in the suit, pending an appeal to the House of Lords. There was an allegation in the information with regard to the forgery of a deed which the defendants had referred for impertinence. The Master had reported it impertinent, but on exceptions to the Master's report, the Master of the Rolls had held the allegation not impertinent. From that decision the defendants had appealed to the Lord Chancellor, who had confirmed it, and they had now appealed to the House of Lords. Such orders had been made in several cases. (Wood v. Milner, 1 Jacob & Walker, 636; King of Spain v. Maclado, 4 Russell, 560; Wood v. Griffith, 19 Vesey, 550; Way v. Foy, 18 Ves. 452.)

James Russell and Campbell, contrà.—The Court never made such orders, except where it was probable that irreparable injury would ensue. (Walbum v. Ingilby, 1 Mylne & Keen, 81.)

The Lord Chancellor.—Although I held the matter which was the subject of appeal to be relevant, I did not consider that it much affected the merits of the case. By granting the motion, I should be tying up the cause for two years. Motion refused.

VICE-CHANCELLOR OF ENGLAND'S COURT.

Thursday, May 2, 1844.

Edwards v. Jones.

Practice—Evidence—Affidavit under 43rd Ord. of Aug. 1841—Production of documents.

Plaintiff claimed as the personal representative of one H. P. whom he alleged to have been one of the next of kin of J. O. who died intestate—the defendants, P. J. and E. his wife, the other next of kin, having got possession of the intestate's estate. The defendants, P. J. and E. his wife, in their answer neither admitted that H. P. had survived the intestate, nor—except as to remembrance and belief—a certain letter stated in the bill to have been written by him, P. J. which amounted to an admission that H. P. had survived the intestate, J. O., although he did not absolutely deny the same.

Held, that the plaintiff could not prove the letter by affidavit upon a motion for payment of money into court, and for a receiver.

The suit out of which this question arose was commenced by one Griffith Edwards and Margaret his wife, as the personal representatives of H. Powell, who was alleged by the bill to have been one of the next of kin to one John Owen, who died intestate, and as such claiming to have been entitled to the personal estate of the said John Owen, jointly with the defendants, Pierce Jones and Ellen his wife, the said Ellen being also next of kin to the intestate. The plaintiffs in their bill alleged that the abovenamed John Owen, being possessed of considerable personal property, died in the year 1835, intestate, leaving his nephew, Howell Powell, and his niece, the defendant, Ellen Jones, his only next of kin him surviving. The bill, moreover, stated that the said H. Powell was, at the time of the intestate's decease, residing in America, and that letters of administration of the personal estate and effects of the intestate were granted to the defendant, Ellen Jones, alone, who, together with her husband, possessed themselves of all his personal estate; but that H. Powell never received any portion thereof, although entitled to a moiety. The bill further alleged that H. Powell died in Nov. 1839 intestate, and that letters of administration to his personal estate were granted to the plaintiff, Margaret Edwards. The bill prayed the usual account; also for the payment to the plaintiff of one moiety of the personal estate of the intestate John Owen, and for a receiver. The defendants, P. Jones and Ellen his wife, by their answer, admitted all that part of the bill excepting that portion which stated that Howell Powell was living at the decease of the intestate, J. Owen. To this they answered as follows :—"These defendants say that he (J. Owen) did leave his niece, this defendant, Ellen Jones, his next of kin him surviving, unless his nephew, Howell Powell, was living at the time of his, the said John Owen's decease; but whether or not the said John Owen did leave his nephew, the said Howell Powell, one of his next of kin, him surviving, these defendants do not know, and cannot set forth as to their belief or otherwise; but if the said Howell Powell was then living, this defendant, Ellen Jones, and the said Howell Powell, were the only next of kin of the said intestate at the time of his decease." The defendants, also, in their answer, admitted that they had in their hands a sum of money forming part of the intestate's personal estate, and also certain documents relating to the matters in question in the suit, except as to whether H. Powell survived the intestate, J. Owen.

The plaintiffs amended their bill by setting forth a letter dated June 21, 1841, written by the plaintiffs' solicitor, and addressed to the defendants, demanding, on behalf of his clients, the plaintiffs, an account of the personal estate of the intestate, J. Owen, and threatening proceedings in Chancery unless the defendants complied with such request. The amendments then stated that, in answer to the above letter, the defendant, P. Jones, wrote and sent to to the plaintiffs' solicitor a letter dated the 21st of August, 1841, from which it would seem that the defendant, P. Jones, was cognizant of the fact that H. Powell survived the intestate, John Owen. The defendants, however, in answer to the plaintiffs' amendments, stated "that they did not recollect, nor could set forth as to their belief or otherwise whether such letter, or of or to such purport or effect, was written by the said Mr. Roberts (the plaintiffs' attorney), or whether the same was received by the defendants, or either of them: and these defendants say, that at the time at which it (the said amended bill) stated that an answer was sent to the said alleged letter of Mr. Roberts, this defendant was, as he now is, nearly blind; and this defendant, P. Jones, speaking to the best of his recollection and belief, denies, and this defendant, Ellen Jones, believes such denial to be true; that the defendant, P. Jones, did, either in answer to the said alleged letter of Mr. Roberts or otherwise, write and send such letter as in the said amended bill mentioned to bear date the 21st of August, 1841, or any other letter, or that such alleged letter was of such date, or in such words and figures, or of or to such purport or effect, as in the said bill in that behalf mentioned, or of any other date, or of or to any purport or effect; however, these defendants say that although they have not, nor hath either of them, any recollection of any such letter as in the said amended bill stated, such a letter may have been written by some person in the habit of being about these defendants; and these defendants, speaking to the best of their knowledge, remembrance, information, and belief, deny that these defendants did, either at the date of the same alleged letter or at any other time, well know or have any reason to believe or suspect that the said H. Powell had survived the said J. Owen and was then dead." The defendants admitted that the above-mentioned documents related to the personal estate of John Owen, the intestate, but that such documents did not amount to evidence of any title common to the plaintiffs and defendants, unless it was shewn that H. Powell survived the said J. Owen, and was, therefore, one of the next of kin of the said J. Owen. The plaintiffs now moved for a production of the documents, papers, and memoranda contained in the third schedule to the defendants' answer—and for the sum of 49*l*. 5*s*. 4*d*. admitted by the defendants to be in their hands belonging to the intestate's estate, also for a receiver.

Bethel and Renshaw, in support of the motion, were about to read an affidavit made by Mr. Roberts, to prove the letter mentioned in the amended bill to have been written and sent by him to the defendants, and the letter sent to him by the defendant P. Jones in reply, but were interrupted on the other side by Stuart and Craig, who contended that an affidavit could not, at this stage of the suit, be read to prove an exhibit, and upon a motion which is invariably founded upon facts admitted by the defendant in his answer.

Bethel.—If there ever existed a doubt whether an affidavit could or not be used to prove an exhibit at this stage of the proceedings, the 43rd Order of the 26th of August, 1841, sets it at rest. [The Vice-Chancellor: But must you not, for the purpose of establishing your proposition, shew that the 43rd Order applies to proving an exhibit not at the hearing?] It would be very inconsistent to hold that you may use the affidavit for that purpose at the hearing, when the very rights of the parties are determined; but that you may not do so upon a mere application which has for its object the protection of the fund.

Cases cited for the plaintiffs: Jefferys v. Smith (1 Jac. & Wal. 298); Hodgson v. Dean (2 S. & S. 221); Ord v. White (3 Bea. 357).

The Vice-Chancellor.—When Lord Cottenham, in 1841, framed the order to which reference has been made, we must suppose that he did so in such a manner as to embrace the cases to which he intended that order to apply. My opinion upon the present question is very clear; and if the discussion had terminated on the previous occasion,(a) I should have decided it in the same manner in which I now decide it. Such a proceeding as the one sought to be taken was never allowed by the practice of this court. A bill, it seems, was filed by parties who claim under a person whom they state to have been entitled as one of the next of kin of an intestate. To this bill the defendants put in their answer, wherein the plaintiffs' title was not admitted, but some kind of a qualified admission was made. The plaintiffs then amended their bill, which the defendants answered in such a manner as to leave it quite uncertain whether a particular document sought to be proved was written or not, or if written, whether it was written by any person who could effectually bind the defendants: for although, according to the peculiar idiom of the Greek, the expression "some person in the habit of being about the defendants" might mean some person acting under the authority of the defendants; yet, according to the construction of the English language, it cannot be said to allow of that interpretation. My opinion is, that upon interlocutory applications of this kind (provided the matter be not the subject of an injunction or waste) the plaintiff cannot, upon the coming in of the defendant's answer, put his case in a better plight than he finds it upon the bill and answer. I, therefore, think that the affidavit must be rejected, and that no satisfactory case has been proved for the payment of the money into court, nor for a receiver. So far, however, as relates to the production of the documents, I am prepared to hear any argument that can be urged in support of the motion.

(a) The motion came on and was partly argued in the month of December 1843.

Where a defendant, by his answer, admits the possession of certain documents mentioned in the schedule which relate to the matters in the suit, save as to the question whether a certain party therein named survived the intestate, and that unless it were proved that the said party did survive the intestate, the documents were no evidence of a title common to the plaintiff and defendant:—Held, notwithstanding this admission, the defendant was not bound to produce such documents.

Bethel, in support of the motion for the production of the documents, contended that as the answer admitted that the documents related to the subject-matter of the suit, the plaintiffs were entitled to their production, and referred to the case of Hardman v. Ellames (2 M. & K. 732); that the principle contained in the cases is, that whenever a defendant admits in his answer that he has in his possession certain documents relating to the matters in dispute, he admits that he possesses documents without the production of which the plaintiff has not a sufficient discovery: that the right to see the document is founded upon the defendant's admission that they relate to the matters in the bill. These documents form part of the discovery, and may put the plaintiff in a situation to prove the very thing which constitutes the subject of dispute; and that where documents are thus admitted, the plaintiff has a right to their production, unless where thay fall within one of the three classes of exceptions; namely, 1st, Privileged communications; 2nd, Documents relating solely to the defendant's title; 3rd, When the discovery, if made, would subject the defendant to pain or penalties.

Cases cited for the plaintiff: Hardman v. Ellames, Tyler v. Drayton (2 S. & S. 309); Bolton v. The Corporation of Liverpool (3 Sim. 467); Combe v. The Corporation of London (1 You. & Coll. 631); Adams v. Fisher (3 My. & C. 526); Smith v. The Duke of Beaufort (1 Hare, 507); Wigram on Discovery.

Stuart and Craig, not heard.

The Vice-Chancellor.—In the present case the answer does not refer to the documents in the defendants' possession within the meaning of a reference as mentioned in that of Hardman v. Ellames, which decided that where a defendant refers to documents in his possession, then they form part of his answer; but if he merely alleges that he has in his possession certain documents, without stating any part of them, or the effect of them, then they do not form a part of his answer. Now to me it appears somewhat marvellous how such different views can be taken upon this subject. To my mind it seems perfectly clear that, as in the present case, where a party sues as representing one of the next of kin to an intestate, and his title is not admitted by the defendant, such a person is not entitled to the production of documents admitted by the defendant's answer to be in his possession, when the defendant merely states that they relate to the affairs of the intestate. The present case differs very materially from that one of Hardman v. Ellames, for there the defendant refers to the documents as evidence of the statement in his answer. The passage which was read to me out of Vice-Chancellor Wigram's Book on Discovery takes it for granted that the party has a title; if it means otherwise, that work is not entitled to the authority it is supposed to possess. I think I cannot do otherwise than refuse the motion. Motion refused.

Will—Legacy—Revocation—Annuity.

A testator, by his will, bequeathed to a servant then in his employ certain legacies; by a codicil he revoked the legacies so bequeathed to his servant, giving him an annuity instead. The servant having left the testator, the latter made another codicil to his last will and testament, revoking every gift therein bequeathed to his late butler, J. F., one year's wages, and the further legacy of 150*l*.: Held, that the annuity given by the former codicil was not revoked.

The testator, H. Cooper, by his will, bearing date the 11th of January, 1830, gave to his butler, J. Faulkner, a legacy of 150*l*. in addition to a year's wages. The testator, some time afterwards, executed a codicil, whereby he revoked the bequests contained in his will in favour of the said J. Faulkner, and in lieu thereof gave him an annuity of 50 guineas per annum during his life. The testator then made another codicil, as follows:—"I, H. Cooper, do make this further codicil, all written with my own hand, to my last will and testament, bearing date the 11th day of January, 1830, and also written with my own hand; that is to say, I revoke every gift therein bequeathed to my late butler, J. Faulkner, one year's wages, and the further legacy of 150*l*." Upon a reference to the Master, he found that J. Faulkner was (notwithstanding the revocation of the other bequests) entitled to the annuity. To this exceptions were taken.

Bethel and Hubback, in support of the exceptions, contended that the word "will" includes also a codicil, as forming but one and the same instrument, and the words "therein bequeathed," in consequence, applied to every antecedent gift. That J. Faulkner having left the testator's service, it was clearly his intention to revoke every kind of benefit which he had given him, but that, in enumerating these bequests, he had fallen into a mistake. (Reade v. Backhouse, 2 R. & M. 546; Crosbie v. Macdoual, 4 Ves. 610.)

Stuart, Anderdon, Craig, and T. S. Williams, for the rest of the parties to the suit, but

The Vice-Chancellor, without hearing them, said, that in his opinion the words of the will were sufficiently clear, and thought that there was no necessity to travel out of the way for the sake of making what a country gentleman chooses to say bear a different meaning from that which he has expressed, and that, under the present circumstances, he should overrule the exceptions.

Braham v. Strathmore.

Practice—Receiver.

Upon a bill filed by an annuitant whose annuity was charged upon the real estate, and it appearing that all arrears had been paid off, Held, that, under the circumstances, the order appointing the receiver ought to be discharged.

This motion was made to discharge an order appointing a receiver (the trustees of the estate giving an undertaking to pay the annuities) under the following circumstances:—

It appears that the Earl of Strathmore had granted an annuity of 1,307*l*. 10*s*. to P. Braham, who in 1814 filed the original bill in the suit on behalf of himself and all other the annuitant creditors of the said Earl of Strathmore. The bill prayed, among other things, for payment of the arrears of the plaintiff's annuity, and for the appointment of a receiver. Several annuities were proved in the Master's office, amounting to 7,732*l*. and several receivers were appointed. By indentures of lease and release, bearing date respectively the 22nd and 23rd Dec. 1823, and the 29th Feb. and 1st March, 1824, the estates charged with the annuities were conveyed to trustees upon trust to receive the rents and to apply them for the purposes therein mentioned. The estates now in the possession of the receivers, after keeping down the several annuities, produced a surplus of 2,500*l*. per annum, and no arrears were now due upon the annuities. It was, moreover, suggested that a great expense was occasioned under the receiver in granting leases, and in other matters connected with the duties of a receiver, and that it did not follow as a matter of course that the Court would continue the order for a receiver so long as the annuity remained charged upon the estate.

Bethel and Lovat, in support of the motion, cited Jenkins v. Miford (1 Jac. & W. 629); Cooke v. Wiggins (10 Ves. 191); Sankey v. O'Maley (2 Mol. 491).

Lowndes and Goldsmid, on the other side, contended, that the bare circumstance of the annuity not having fallen into arrear since the appointment of the receiver sufficiently proved that his appointment was rather beneficial than otherwise, and that there existed no proof that, during the continuance of the receiver, a greater expense in granting leases had been incurred than if he had not been appointed.

Stuart, for other defendants.

His Honour the Vice-Chancellor stated that he considered that the question was one only for the discretion of the Court, and that, so far as he could recollect, it was the only instance which had occurred before him wherein an estate, unable to pay interest at first, grew up into a state of solvency, and paid full interest at last. But that in this case, either by reason of the improvement of rents, or from some other causes, it appeared that the rental amounted to at least 10,000*l*. a year. His Honour moreover remarked, that the annuitants contended that it would be necessary for them to obtain the consent of all parties to the leases, which he conceived would only perhaps be a shifting in form, which would occasion the leases to be settled in the usual manner by the concurrence of all parties out of the Master's office; but it seemed to him that, subject to the offers made by the trustees to pay the annuitants, there was no ground of objection why the application for discharging the order should not be granted; and that if any prejudice should occur (which did not seem likely), it would be competent to the parties so injured to apply to the Court for redress.

Jones v. Griffith.

Practice—Evidence—Bill and answer.

Where a cause comes to a hearing upon bill and answer only, the plaintiff not having filed his replication, it is not the practice of the Court to travel out of the answer for proof of the plaintiff's case; therefore, where the defendant in his answer neither admitted nor denied a bond upon which the plaintiffs founded their suit, and the answer was not replied to, the Court refused to suffer the bond to be proved by affidavit, notwithstanding the 43rd order, 26th Aug. 1841.

The question arose out of a creditor's suit by the representatives of a bond creditor against the devisees and heir-at-law of a testator and other persons interested in the estate. The bill was filed for the purpose of enforcing payment of the plaintiffs' claim out of the real and personal estate of the testator. The heir-at-law filed his answer, wherein he disputed the testator's will, and stated that he did not know, and had not been informed, except by the bill, and could not set forth as to his belief or otherwise, whether the testator was indebted in the sum mentioned in the bill, nor whether the testator executed the bond so alleged by the plaintiffs to have been executed by him. The plaintiffs did not file a replication to this answer, but set down the cause upon bill and answer only. The plaintiffs then, under the 43rd order of August 1841 (which directs that in cases in which any exhibit may by the present practice of the Courts be proved vivâ voce at the hearing of a cause, the same may be proved by the affidavit of the witness who would be competent to prove the same vivâ voce at the hearing), having obtained and served an order for that purpose upon the defendants, proved their bond by affidavit. The cause now came on for hearing.

Bethel and Nevinson appeared for the heir-at-law, and contended that the plaintiffs, not having replied to the defendants' answer, were not in a position to prove the bond by affidavit under the above order.

Wakefield and Anstey, for the plaintiffs, referred to the case of Rowland v. Sturgis (2 Hare, 520), and stated that the practice as therein laid down had been recognized and followed in the Court of Chancery in Ireland.

Glasse, Leach, Goldsmith, and L. Oliver appeared for the other parties.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said that whatever might be the practice existing in Ireland, such a proceeding as that alluded to was certainly not the practice in this country, and that he would not allow the bond to be proved; for that where the plaintiff has not replied, the Court cannot look out of the defendant's answer.

The bill as against the heir-at-law dismissed with costs.

AUGUST SESSIONS.

REG. v. WATTS and OTHERS.

Where a prisoner is about to make a confession to a policeman, he ought not to be cautioned by the latter as to the consequence of his so doing.

The prisoners were indicted for rape, and in the course of the case, a policeman was called to prove the apprehension of one of them, and also a statement which he then made.

Charnock, for the prisoner, inquired of the policeman whether the man had been previously cautioned by him.

GURNEY, B.—I think it right to say it is not the business of police-officers to caution persons in their custody, and who are about to make statements, not to do so. Their duty is to abstain from inducing them to make them. It is indeed a most miserable affectation of candour to say—"Pray, Sir, do not make any observations, as they may possibly be used hereafter against you?" It is a very absurd thing, and has the effect of interfering seriously with justice, and preventing the detection of criminals. Some of the most learned judges on the bench are, I know, of the same opinion.

SEPTEMBER SESSIONS.

Wednesday, Sept. 18.

REG. v. PARKER and JACOBS.

Quære, whether a witness is bound to answer a question that has a tendency to degrade him?

The prisoners were indicted for burglary, and in the course of the proceedings,

Paine, for the defence, asked a witness, in cross-examination, whether he had not been charged with a crime and imprisoned two years?

CRESSWELL, J. thought that the witness was not bound to answer the question.

Paine submitted that the prisoner was merely privileged from answering where the answer might subject him to punishment. Here the interrogation involved the supposition that he had suffered the penalty of the offence. He quoted Archbold, 7th ed. 143. There, in two cases (R. v. Holding and R. v. Slaney), the latter reported in 5 C. & P. 213, it was laid down, in the one, that any thing tending to criminate the witness, in the other, that whatever might subject him to future punishment, he was not bound to admit, but that all other questions must be answered.

CRESSWELL, J.—The matter itself is of an infamous nature to which you seek a reply. If so, he is not bound to answer, though you may put the question. His lordship quoted from the last edition of Russell on Crimes, an opinion to that effect given by C. J. Treby. Afterwards, in summing up, the learned judge remarked:—"I think it is desirable that some uniform rule of practice should be laid down by the judges on this point, since there are so many contradictory dicta respecting it; and if the question had been a very material one in this case, I should have desired it to be more fully argued before I decided. It is certainly a matter that requires very serious consideration."

THE LEGISLATOR.

Summary.

We give to-day the proposed Medical Reform Bill almost verbatim. It is exciting considerable attention amongst the Medical Profession, and public meetings have been held on the subject in London, Birmingham, and other large towns. The statutes of last session continue to occupy much space, as we are desirous of bringing them to a conclusion before the end of the vacation.

16. Physicians.—And be it enacted, That no person except such legal practitioners as are hereinafter mentioned, shall be entitled to be registered by the council as a physician unless he shall have attained the age of twenty-six years, and shall have graduated in medicine in some university of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, or, subject to the restriction hereinafter contained, in some foreign university, and shall also have been examined by one of the Royal Colleges of Physicians of England, Scotland, or Ireland, or by the Royal College of Physicians and Surgeons of Glasgow, after such proof as shall be satisfactory to the examining college that he has applied himself to medical studies during at least five years, or if he is not a graduate in medicine of any such university, unless he shall have attained the age of forty years, and shall have been examined by the Royal College of Physicians of England; and in each case shall have received letters testimonial from the examining college of his being duly qualified to practise as a physician; and no person shall be entitled to be received for examination for the purpose of being so registered as a physician upon a foreign degree in medicine, unless the Royal College of Physicians of England, Scotland, or Ireland shall give him a special certificate, to be laid before and approved by the Council of Health and Medical Education, that they have made inquiry into the manner in which such degree was conferred, and have ascertained that it has been granted after residence within the precincts of the same university during at least one year, and after due examination and upon satisfactory certificates of previous study.

17. Physicians and surgeons may be registered on double testimonials.—And be it enacted, That it shall be lawful for the same person, if possessed of the necessary testimonials, to be registered as both physician and surgeon, and for a registered physician, or a person applying to be registered as a physician, to offer himself for examination as a licentiate in surgery by one of the said Royal Colleges of surgeons, and for a registered surgeon, or a person applying to be registered as a surgeon, to offer himself for examination as a licentiate in medicine by one of the said Royal Colleges of Physicians, assisted in England by the Court of Examiners of the Apothecaries' Company; and every such physician or surgeon shall be entitled to be also registered upon the testimonials granted to him upon such additional examination, in such form and manner as shall be determined by the said council.

19. Qualifications and fees.—And be it enacted, That the said several colleges shall, from time to time, when required by the said council, prepare and lay before the said council a scheme or schemes of the course of study and particulars of the examination to be gone through by all persons applying to such colleges respectively for letters testimonial as physician, or surgeon, or licentiate, and of the fees to be taken for examination and admission into the said several colleges respectively; and the said council shall be empowered to make from time to time such changes in any of the schemes so laid before them as to the said council shall seem expedient; and the said council shall endeavour to procure, as far as is practicable and convenient, that the qualifications and fees for the said testimonials shall be uniform, according to the nature thereof throughout the said United Kingdom.

20. Restriction on medical degrees.—And be it enacted, That after the passing of this Act it shall not be lawful for any university of the said United Kingdom to confer any degree in the faculty of medicine upon any person, unless he shall have been matriculated in the same university, and shall have duly attended the courses of public lectures prescribed by the same university to students in medicine within the precincts of the same university, or of some medical school recognized by and in connexion with the same university, during at least two years next before the granting of such degree, and shall have been examined at some time before granting such degree by the proper examiners of such university, and found by them to possess competent skill and knowledge of medicine, and of the sciences connected therewith, and of the English and Latin languages at least; and every diploma or certificate of a medical degree granted by any such university after the passing of this Act, shall set forth distinctly the time which has elapsed since the matriculation of the person to whom such degree shall be granted, and the time during which, and place at which he shall have actually studied as aforesaid, and the fact that he has passed such examination as last aforesaid.

21. Declaration concerning bachelors of medicine at the age of twenty-two.—And be it declared and enacted, That it shall be lawful for any university of the said United Kingdom to grant the degree of bachelor in the faculty of medicine, subject to the restrictions hereinbefore contained concerning medical degrees, to any student of the same university who shall have attained the age of twenty-two years; and that every such graduate in the faculty of medicine, being also examined and having received letters testimonial of his qualification in the manner hereinbefore prescribed in the case of licentiates in medicine and surgery, or examined and furnished with the like letters testimonial by the Royal College of Physicians and Surgeons of Glasgow, if the said degree shall have been granted by the University of Glasgow, shall be entitled to be registered by the said Council of Health and Medical Education as a licentiate in medicine and surgery, subject to such general regulations as shall be made by the said council concerning the registry of licentiates.

22. Restriction on bye-laws.—And be it enacted, That no bye-law to be made by any of the Royal Colleges of Physicians or Surgeons of England, Scotland, or Ireland respectively, or by the Royal College of Physicians and Surgeons of Glasgow, shall be of any force until a copy thereof, sealed with the seal of the same college, shall have been laid before and approved by the said Council of Health and Medical Education.

23. Registry of students.—And be it enacted, That it shall be lawful for the said council to make regulations for ensuring the registry of all medical and surgical students by the proper officers of the several hospitals or medical or surgical schools at which they shall study, and to authorize such officers to take a fee for such registration, not being more in each case than ten shillings, and for requiring all such fees to be remitted to the secretary of the said council, and returns to be made to them of the registration of all such students, in such manner and form as the council shall think fit; and no hospital or medical or surgical school shall be recognized by any of the said colleges, which shall neglect or refuse to give due effect to such regulations, after notice of such neglect or refusal shall have been sent by the said council to the said colleges, until the default of such hospital or medical or surgical school be amended to the satisfaction of the said council, and all such fees shall be applied toward the expenses of this Act.

24. Constitution of the examining bodies.—And be it enacted, That where by this Act it is provided that the concurrence of more than one body is required for qualifying any person to be registered by the said council, the examination before such bodies for his degree or letters testimonial, or both, may be conducted either separately before examiners appointed by each body, or before a joint board of examiners, to be appointed by each body separately or conjointly, who shall be appointed in such number, manner, and form, and shall hold their examinations at such times and places as such bodies shall, with the approval of the said council, agree from time to time among themselves, or as shall be determined by the said council with respect to any point in which they shall not be agreed; and where there shall be separate examinations before examiners appointed by each body, the subjects and fees of examination shall be divided among such bodies as they shall from time to time agree among themselves, or as the said council from time to time shall determine with respect to any subject on which they shall not be agreed.

25. For securing efficiency of examination.—And be it enacted, That the said council may from time to time require returns to be made in such form, and including such particulars, as they shall think fit, respecting the examinations to be conducted as aforesaid, and it shall be lawful for any secretary of the said council, deputed by the council for that purpose, or for any member of the said council, to be present at any of the said examinations; and if the council shall be of opinion that the regulations prescribed by them for the examination and grant of letters testimonial as physician, surgeon, or licentiate, have been infringed, evaded, or neglected by any of the said examining bodies, it shall be lawful for the said council to refuse to register upon the testimonials of the body so in default, until the same be amended to the satisfaction of the said council.

26. None but those registered to be appointed to public situations.—And be it enacted, That, subject to the reservations hereinafter contained, no person after the passing of this Act who is not registered by the said council shall be appointed to any medical or surgical office in any public hospital, prison, infirmary, dispensary, workhouse, or other public institution in the said United Kingdom, or to any medical or surgical office in her Majesty's Army or Navy, or in the service of the Honourable East India Company, except in India, natives of India duly qualified according to such laws or regulations as are or shall be made in that behalf by the Governor-General in Council; and wherever by law it is provided that any act shall be done by a physician or surgeon, or medical or surgical practitioner, by whatever name or title he is called, such provision shall be construed, after the passing of this Act, to mean a person qualified to be appointed to such medical or surgical offices as aforesaid; and the council of health shall be empowered from time to time to make regulations for specifying what institutions are to be considered public institutions within the meaning of this Act, and which form of testimonial shall be necessary to qualify the holder thereof for every such situation.

27. Privileges of persons registered.—And be it enacted, That all persons who are registered by the said council as physicians, surgeons, or licentiates, shall be exempt while practising as such from being summoned or serving on all juries and inquests whatsoever, and from serving all corporate, parochial, ward, hundred and township offices, but, subject to the reservations hereinafter contained, no person shall be entitled to such exemption, on the ground of his practising medicine or surgery, who is not so registered, nor shall the certificate of any such unregistered person, given after the passing of this Act, be received as the certificate of a medical or surgical practitioner in any court of law, or in any case in which by law the certificate of a medical or surgical practitioner is required.

28. Persons now practising may be registered.—Provided always, and be it enacted, That it shall be lawful for the said council, on the application, within twelve calendar months after the passing of this Act, of any person legally practising as a physician, surgeon, or apothecary, at the time of the passing of this Act, in any part of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, or on the application within two years of any person so legally practising in any of her Majesty's colonies and foreign possessions, to cause the name of such person to be registered as a physician, surgeon, or licentiate in medicine and surgery, as the case may be, on production to the said council of his diploma, license, or certificate, or such other proof as shall be satisfactory to the said council, that at the time of the passing of this Act he was legally entitled to practise as a physician, surgeon, or apothecary, as the case may be, in some part of the said United Kingdom, and on payment of a fee of two pounds in the case of fellows or associates of the said colleges of physicians and surgeons respectively, and of five shillings in every other case, which fees shall be applied toward the expenses of this Act; and during the said period of twelve calendar months every person legally practising as a physician, surgeon, or apothecary at the time of the passing of this Act in the said United Kingdom, and during the said period of two years, every person so legally practising in any of her Majesty's colonies and foreign possessions, although not registered, shall continue to enjoy the same privileges and exemptions, and be qualified to be appointed to the same offices, and to practise in the same manner as if this Act had not been passed, and no farther or otherwise, unless registered under this Act.

29. Penalty on unqualified persons for practising in public offices.—And be it enacted, That every person appointed after the passing of this Act to any medical or surgical office for which he is not qualified according to the provisions of this Act and the regulations of the said council, and who shall act or practise in such office, shall for every such offence forfeit the sum of twenty pounds, to be recovered by action of debt or information to be brought in any of her Majesty's Courts of Record at Westminster, or in the Court of Exchequer in Scotland, or in Dublin, within six calendar months next after the commission of the offence, and to be recovered in the name of her Majesty's Attorney-General in England or Ireland, or of the Lord Advocate in Scotland.

30. None but registered persons or those already practising may recover charges.—And be it enacted, That after the passing of this Act, no person shall be entitled to recover any charge in any court of law for any medical or surgical advice, attendance, or operation, or for any medicine prescribed or administered, unless he shall prove upon the trial either that he is registered under this Act, or that he was legally practising in the capacity in which he claims such charge before the passing of this Act.

31. Penalty for falsely pretending to be on the register.—And be it enacted, That every unregistered person who shall wilfully and falsely pretend to be, or take or use any name or title implying that he is registered under this Act, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor in England and Ireland, and in Scotland of a crime and offence, and being convicted thereof, shall be punished by fine or imprisonment, or both, as the court before which he shall be convicted shall award.

CAP. [illegible]

An Act for amending an Act passed in the Fourth Year of the Reign of his late Majesty, intituled "An Act for the better Administration of Justice in his Majesty's Privy Council;" and to extend its Jurisdiction and Powers. (August 6, 1844.)

We give the statute entire.

3 & 4 Wm. 4, c. 41; 5 & 6 Wm. 4, c. 83. Her Majesty, by Order in Council, may provide for the admission of an appeal from any colony, although there shall not be a court of error or of appeal in such colony; and may revoke such orders. Orders may be either general or special. General orders to be published. Nothing herein to affect the present powers for regulating appeals from the colonies.—Whereas the Act passed in the fourth year of the reign of his late Majesty, intituled "An Act for the better Administration of Justice in his Majesty's Privy Council," hath been found beneficial to the due administration of justice: and whereas another Act, passed in the sixth year of the said reign, intituled "An Act to amend the Law touching Letters Patent for Inventions," hath been also found advantageous to inventors and to the public: and whereas the Judicial Committee acting under the authority of the said Acts hath been found to answer well the purposes for which it was so established by Parliament, but it is found necessary to improve its proceedings in some respects, for the better despatch of business, and expedient also to extend its jurisdiction and powers: and whereas by the laws now in force in certain of her Majesty's colonies and possessions abroad no appeals can be brought to her Majesty in Council for the reversal of the judgments, sentences, decrees, and orders of any courts of justice within such colonies, save only of the courts of error or courts of appeal within the same, and it is expedient that her Majesty in Council should be authorized to provide for the admission of appeals from other courts of justice within such colonies or possessions: be it therefore enacted by the Queen's most excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, That it shall be competent to her Majesty, by any order or orders to be from time to time for that purpose made with the advice of her Privy Council, to provide for the admission of any appeal or appeals to her Majesty in Council from any judgments, sentences, decrees, or orders of any court of justice within any British colony or possession abroad, although such court shall not be a court of errors or a court of appeal within such colony or possession; and it shall also be competent to her Majesty, by any such order or orders as aforesaid, to make all such provisions as to her Majesty in Council shall seem meet for the instituting and prosecuting any such appeals, and for carrying into effect any such decisions or sentences as her Majesty in Council shall pronounce thereon: Provided always, that it shall be competent to her Majesty in Council to revoke, alter, and amend any such order or orders as aforesaid as to her Majesty in Council shall seem meet: provided also, that any such order as aforesaid may be either general and extending to all appeals to be brought from any such court of justice as aforesaid, or special and extending only to any appeal to be brought in any particular case: provided also, that every such general Order in Council as aforesaid shall be published in the London Gazette within one calendar month next after the making thereof: provided also, that nothing herein contained shall be construed to extend to take away or diminish any power now by law vested in her Majesty for regulating appeals to her Majesty in Council from the judgments, sentences, decrees, or orders of any courts of justice within any of her Majesty's colonies or possessions abroad.

2. On petition her Majesty may grant an extension of patent term in certain cases.—And whereas it is expedient, for the further encouragement of inventions in the useful arts, to enable the time of monopoly in patents to be extended in cases in which it can be satisfactorily shewn that the expense of the invention hath been greater than the time now limited by law will suffice to reimburse; be it enacted, That if any person, having obtained a patent for any invention, shall before the expiration thereof present a petition to her Majesty in council, setting forth that he has been unable to obtain a due remuneration for his expense and labour in perfecting such invention, and that an exclusive right of using and vending the same for the further period of seven years, in addition to the term in such patent mentioned, will not suffice for his reimbursement and remuneration, then, if the matter of such petition shall be by her Majesty referred to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, the said committee shall proceed to consider the same after the manner and in the usual course of its proceedings touching patents, and if the said committee shall be of opinion, and shall so report to her Majesty, that a further period greater than seven years' extension of the said patent term ought to be granted to the petitioner, it shall be lawful for her Majesty, if she shall so think fit, to grant an extension thereof for any time not exceeding fourteen years, in like manner and subject to the same rules as the extension for a term not exceeding seven years is now granted under the powers of the said Act of the sixth year of the reign of his late Majesty.

3. Her Majesty may grant extension for a lesser term than that prayed.—Provided always, and be it enacted, That nothing herein contained shall prevent the said Judicial Committee from reporting that an extension for any period not exceeding seven years should be granted, or prevent her Majesty from granting an extension for such lesser term than the petition shall have prayed.

4. As to extension of term where patentees have assigned their patent rights.—And whereas doubts have arisen touching the power given by the said recited Act of the sixth year of the reign of his late Majesty in cases where the patentees have wholly or in part assigned their right; be it enacted, That it shall be lawful for her Majesty, on the report of the Judicial Committee, to grant such extension as is authorized by the said Act and by this Act, either to an assignee or assignees or to the original patentee or patentees, or to an assignee or assignees and original patentee or patentees conjointly.

5. Disclaimer and memorandum of alteration under 5 & 6 Wm. 4, c. 83, may be made notwithstanding original patentee may have assigned his patent right.—And be it enacted, That in case the original patentee or patentees hath or have parted with his or their whole or any part of his or their interest by assignment to any other person or persons, it shall be lawful for such patentee, together with such assignee or assignees if part only hath been assigned, and for the assignee or assignees if the whole hath been assigned, to enter a disclaimer and memorandum of alteration under the powers of the said recited Act; and such disclaimer and memorandum of such alteration, having been so entered and filed as in the said recited Act mentioned, shall be valid and effectual in favour of any person or persons in whom the rights under the said letters patent may then be or thereafter become legally vested; and no objection shall be made in any proceeding whatsoever on the ground that the party making such disclaimer or memorandum of such alteration had not sufficient authority in that behalf.

6. Disclaimer and memorandum of alteration already made to be deemed valid.—And be it enacted, That any disclaimer or memorandum of alteration before the passing of this Act, or by virtue of the said recited Act, by such patentee with such assignee or by such assignee as aforesaid, shall be valid and effectual to bind any person or persons in whom the said letters patent might then be or have since become vested; and no objection shall be made in any proceeding whatsoever that the party making such disclaimer or memorandum of alteration had not authority in that behalf.

7. New letters patent granted under 5 & 6 Wm. 4, to assignees before passing of this Act declared valid. Proviso.—And be it enacted, That any new letters patent which before the passing of this Act may have been granted, under the provisions of the above-recited Act of the sixth year of the reign of his late Majesty, to an assignee or assignees, shall be as valid and effectual as if the said letters patent had been made after the passing of this Act, and the title of any party to such new letters patent shall not be invalidated by reason of the same having been granted to an assignee or assignees: Provided always, that nothing herein contained shall give any validity or effect to any letters patent heretofore granted to any assignee or assignees where any action or proceeding in scire facias or suit in equity shall have been commenced at any time before the passing of this Act, wherein the validity of such letters patent shall have been or may be questioned.

8. Judicial Committee may appoint clerk of Privy Council to take proofs in matters referred to them.—Provided always, and be it enacted, That in the case of any matter or thing being referred to the Judicial Committee, it shall be lawful for the said committee to appoint one or other of the clerks of the Privy Council to take any formal proofs required to be taken in dealing with the matter or thing so referred, and shall, if they so think fit, proceed upon such clerk's report to them as if such formal proofs had been taken by and before the said Judicial Committee.

9. Judicial Committee may proceed to hearing of appeals without special order of reference. Proviso.—And be it enacted, That in case any petition of appeal whatever shall be presented, addressed to her Majesty in Council, and such petition shall be duly lodged with the clerk of the Privy Council, it shall be lawful for the said Judicial Committee to proceed in hearing and reporting upon such appeal, without any special Order in Council referring the same to them, provided that her Majesty in Council shall have, by an Order in Council in the month of November, directed that all appeals shall be referred to the said Judicial Committee on which petitions may be presented to her Majesty in Council during the twelve months next after the making of such order; and that the said Judicial Committee shall proceed to hear and report upon all such appeals in like manner as if each such appeal had been referred to the said Judicial Committee by a special order of her Majesty in Council: Provided always, that it shall be lawful for her Majesty in Council at any time to rescind any general order so made; and in case of such order being so rescinded all petitions of appeal shall in the first instance be preferred to her Majesty in Council, and shall not be proceeded with by the said Judicial Committee without a special order of reference.

10. Judicial Committee may require notes of evidence taken in the courts of any colony, &c. of the Crown.—And be it enacted, That it shall be lawful for the said Judicial Committee to make an order or orders on any court in any colony or foreign settlement, or foreign dominion of the Crown, requiring the judge or judges of such court to transmit to the clerk of the Privy Council a copy of the notes of evidence in any cause tried before such court, and of the reasons given by the judge or judges for the judgment pronounced in any case brought by appeal or by writ of error before the said Judicial Committee.

11. Judicial Committee may make rules to be binding upon such courts requiring judges' notes of evidence, &c.—And be it enacted, That it shall and may be lawful for the said Judicial Committee to make any general rule or regulation, to be binding upon all courts in the colonies and other foreign settlements of the Crown, requiring the judges' notes of the evidence taken before such Court on any cause appealed, and of the reasons given by the judges of such court, or by any of them, for or against the judgment pronounced by such Court; which notes of evidence and reasons shall by such Court be transmitted to the clerk of the Privy Council within one calendar month next after the leave given by such Court to prosecute any appeal to her Majesty in Council; and such order of the said committee shall be binding upon all judges of such courts in the colonies or foreign settlements of the Crown.

12. In cases of neglect to comply with Order of Council persons so neglecting may be punished as for contempt.—And be it enacted, That in all causes of appeal to her Majesty in Council from Ecclesiastical Courts, and from Admiralty or Vice-Admiralty Courts, which are now or may hereafter be depending, in which any person duly monished or cited or requested to comply with any lawful order or decree of her Majesty in Council, or of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council or their surrogates, made before or after the passing of this Act, shall neglect or refuse to pay obedience to such lawful order or decree, or shall commit any contempt of the process under the seal of her Majesty in ecclesiastical and maritime causes, it shall be lawful for the said Judicial Committee or their surrogates to pronounce such person to be contumacious and in contempt, and, after he or she shall have been so pronounced contumacious and in contempt, to cause process of sequestration to issue under the said seal of her Majesty against the real and personal estate, goods, chattels, and effects, wheresoever lying within the dominions of her Majesty, of the person against or upon whom such order or decree shall have been made, in order to enforce obedience to the same and payment of the expenses attending such sequestration, and all proceedings consequent thereon, and to make such further order in respect of or consequent on such sequestration, and in respect to such real and personal estates, goods, chattels, and effects sequestrated thereby, as may be necessary, or for payment of moneys arising from the same to the person to whom the same may be due, or into the registry of the High Court of Admiralty and Appeals, for the benefit of those who may be ultimately entitled thereto.

13. Act may be repealed, &c. this session.—And be it enacted, That this Act may be repealed or amended during this session of Parliament.

CAP. LXX.

An Act for facilitating Arrangements between Debtors and Creditors. (August 6, 1844.)

We gave this statute entire at page 396 of the present volume, and thither the reader is referred.

CAP. LXXI.

An Act for the better Administration of Criminal Justice in Middlesex. (August 6, 1844.)

We give this statute entire:—

Two sessions to be held in every month; quarter sessions.—Whereas it is desirable, for the better administration of criminal justice in the county of Middlesex, that sessions of the peace for the trial of felonies and misdemeanors committed within the said county should be holden more frequently, and that an assistant judge, of competent legal knowledge, should be appointed to preside at such sessions: be it enacted by the Queen's most excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, That after the passing of this Act there shall be holden in and for the county of Middlesex two sessions or adjourned sessions of the peace at least in every calendar month, and the first sessions holden in the months of January, April, July, and October respectively shall be the general quarter sessions of the said county.

2. General sessions.—And be it enacted, That the second sessions, or the adjourned sessions, holden in the months of February, May, August, and November respectively, and such other sessions as the justices for the county in the first sessions holden in the month of December assembled shall from time to time appoint, shall be general sessions of the peace; and such general sessions shall have power to try and determine all appeals, and all other powers which now or shall hereafter belong to the general quarter sessions.

3. Validity of proceedings at general sessions.—And be it enacted, That all orders heretofore made and all things heretofore done at any general session of the peace for the county of Middlesex shall be as good in law as if made and done at the general quarter sessions of the peace for the said county.

4. Adjournment of general quarter sessions.—And be it enacted, That the second sessions holden in the months of January, April, July, and October shall be adjournments of the general quarter sessions.

5. Sessions may be held notwithstanding the sitting of the Court of Queen's Bench.—And be it enacted, That after the passing of this Act it shall be lawful to begin and continue, or to continue when begun, any session of the peace for the said county so to be holden as aforesaid, until the business thereof shall be ended, notwithstanding that her Majesty's Court of Queen's Bench may sit at Westminster or elsewhere in the said county before or at the beginning or during the continuance of any such session.

6. Indictments for misdemeanor not to be traversed without cause shewn.—And be it enacted, That no person against whom any bill of indictment shall be found for misdemeanor at the Central Criminal Court, or at any session of the peace for the county of Middlesex, shall be entitled to traverse the same to any subsequent sitting of the Court, but the Court shall forthwith proceed to try the same, unless upon good cause to be shewn by the person against whom the same is found, or the prosecutor, and to be allowed by the Court, for the postponement of the trial.

7. Allowance out of county rates to be made to sheriff, &c. in addition to other emoluments.—And be it enacted, That the justices of the said county shall cause an account to be taken of the fees received by the sheriff or his deputy for summoning traverse juries during the last three years, and shall be authorized to allow and cause to be paid yearly, for such time as to them shall seem fit, to the said sheriff or his deputy, out of the county rates of the said county, in addition to the other emoluments of his office, any sum not exceeding the average yearly amount of the fees received by him for summoning traverse juries during the said three years.

8. An assistant judge to be appointed to preside at the sessions in certain cases. Deputy. Nothing herein to interfere with the appointment of the chairman of the court.—And be it enacted, That it shall be lawful for her Majesty, her heirs and successors, by sign manual, to appoint a person, being a serjeant or barrister-at-law of not less than ten years' standing, and in the commission of the peace for the said county, and qualified by law to act as a justice of the peace, to be the assistant judge of the said court of the sessions of the peace, which said assistant judge shall preside at the hearing of all appeals, and at the trial of all felonies and misdemeanors in the said court, and all matters connected therewith, and shall hold his office during good behaviour; and in case of sickness or unavoidable absence, and on such other occasions as shall be allowed by one of her Majesty's principal secretaries of state, such assistant judge shall be empowered from time to time to appoint a deputy, qualified to be appointed assistant judge, who shall have power to act for him for such time as shall be in each case allowed by the Secretary of State, not being in any case later than the end of the business at the session of the peace then next but one following: provided always, that nothing in this Act contained shall interfere with the appointment of the chairman of the said Court for all purposes except the trials of appeals and of felonies and misdemeanors, and other matters connected therewith, but such appointment shall remain in the said justices as before the passing of this Act; provided also, that the said assistant judge, so long as he shall hold the said office, shall not be eligible to sit in Parliament.

9. Formation of the Court. Jurisdiction of justices in session to continue.—And be it enacted, That the presence of another justice of the peace shall not be essential to the formation of the court in those cases in which it is directed by this Act that the assistant judge or his deputy for the time being shall preside; but nothing in this Act contained shall lessen the jurisdiction of the justices at the said sessions.

10. Salary to assistant judge.—And be it enacted, That from and after the appointment of such assistant judge as aforesaid there shall be paid out of the consolidated fund of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland the sum of one thousand two hundred pounds to such assistant judge for a yearly salary, to be paid from time to time quarterly, free and clear from all taxes and deductions whatsoever (except the income tax), on the fifth day of January, the fifth day of April, the fifth day of July, and the tenth day of October, by equal portions, the first payment to be made on the first of such days as shall occur after the appointment of the said assistant judge; and that if any person appointed to such office shall die, or resign the same, the executors or administrators of such person so dying, or the person resigning, shall be entitled to receive such portion of the salary aforesaid as shall have accrued during the time that such person shall have executed such office since the last payment, and that the successor of any such person so dying or resigning shall be entitled to receive such portion of the salary as shall accrue from the day of such death, resignation, or dismissal.

11. Sessions of the peace for Westminster not to be holden.—And whereas by an Act passed in the ninth year of the reign of King George the Fourth, intituled "An Act to enable the Justices of the Peace for Westminster to hold their Sessions of the Peace during Term and the sitting of the Court of King's Bench," the sessions of the peace for the said city and liberty are limited to the weeks preceding the holding of each of the quarter or general sessions of the peace for the said county of Middlesex: And whereas by ancient usage and of right the justices of the peace for Middlesex have constantly holden and may hold their sessions of the peace for the said county within the said city and liberty, and the holding of sessions for the city and liberty has become unnecessary; be it enacted, That after the session of the peace which shall be holden in and for the said city and liberty next after the passing of this Act sessions of the peace in and for the said city and liberty shall cease to be holden, and the sessions to be holden in and for the said county of Middlesex shall be holden by adjournment within the said city and liberty, and shall have full jurisdiction over all things cognizable by the sessions for the said city and liberty; and that the inhabitants of the said city and liberty shall not be exempted from serving on juries at the sessions of the peace for the county of Middlesex holden within the said city and liberty.

12. Officers belonging to the city of Westminster to be compensated while executing their duties.—And be it enacted, That the persons holding the several offices of high bailiff of Westminster, clerk of the peace, and all other officers of the court of sessions of the peace for the said city and liberty, shall, so long as they shall be entitled to hold their several offices, execute the duties and be entitled to the emoluments within the said city and liberty of the several offices of sheriff, clerk of the peace, and other corresponding officers of the county of Middlesex: provided always, that the records of every session of the peace for the said county holden within the said city and liberty shall be sent, within fourteen days after such session, by the clerk of the peace of the said city and liberty, to the clerk of the peace of the said county, and shall be kept by him with the other records of his office.

13. Justices for the county to have the sole control over the county rate. 7 Geo. 4, c. 42.—And whereas by an Act passed in twelfth year of the reign of King George the Second, intituled "An Act for the more easy assessing, levying, and collecting County Rates," it was enacted, that there should be but one rate made and assessed by the justices of the peace of the said county of Middlesex and the said city and liberties of Westminster for the several purposes enumerated in that Act: And whereas by an Act passed in the seventh year of the reign of King George the Fourth, intituled "An Act for building a new Bridewell or House of Correction for the said City and Liberty of Westminster," a house of correction, commonly called the New Bridewell, was built out of moneys charged and assessed upon the county rates, which said bridewell is much larger than is needed for the said city and liberty; but the house of correction for the county of Middlesex is so small that the prisoners therein cannot be properly classified: And whereas inconveniences arise from the present management of the county rate being vested partly in the justices for the said county and partly in the justices for the said city and liberty, and it would be a public advantage if the management of the county rate were solely in the justices of the said county, and if the said New Bridewell were made a house of correction for the whole county, and placed under the control and management of the justices of the said county; be it enacted, That after the passing of this Act the justices for the said city and liberty shall cease to exercise any control over the county rate, and the justices of the said county shall have the sole control and management thereof; and all orders for the payment of any sums of money out of the county rate, in respect of any expenditure within the said city and liberty, shall be made by the justices for the said county upon the county treasurer, in like manner as all other orders are made by them upon him; and the said treasurer shall obey the same, and shall from time to time include the same in his accounts, and the same shall be subject to all the statutes and provisions for the regulation of the rate for the said county, and shall form part of the general expenditure for the said county.

14. Justices for the county to have the sole control over the court-house for Westminster.—And be it enacted, That so much of an Act passed in the forty-seventh year of the reign of King George the Third, intituled "An Act to amend Three Acts, of the Eighteenth, Thirty-ninth, and Forty-fourth Years of his present Majesty, for erecting a Court-house for the holding of Sessions of the Peace in the City of Westminster," as enacts that the court-house for the said city of Westminster shall be under the sole direction and management of the justices of the peace for the time being of the city and liberty of Westminster, shall be repealed; and that after the passing of this Act the control and management of the said court-house, and all the powers and provisions respecting the same, in the said Acts vested in the justices for the city and liberty, shall be vested in the justices for the said county of Middlesex, as fully as if they had been named in the said Acts.

15. Property in the New Bridewell to be vested in the justices of the county.—And be it enacted, That after the passing of this Act all the powers and property in respect of the said New Bridewell by the before-mentioned Act of the seventh year of the reign of King George the Fourth vested in the justices for the said city and liberty of Westminster, and also all the furniture, goods, and chattels belonging to the said New Bridewell, shall be transferred to and vested in the justices for the said county.

16. The New Bridewell to be a house of correction for the county generally. 23 Geo. 2, c. 27.—And be it enacted, That so much of the said Act of the seventh year of the reign of King George the Fourth as enact that no person or persons, other than or beside the justices of the peace for the said city and liberty of Westminster, and also the commissioners for executing an Act passed in the twenty-third year of the reign of his Majesty King George the Second, intituled "An Act for the more easy and speedy Recovery of Small Debts within the City and Liberty of Westminster and that Part of the Duchy of Lancaster which adjoins thereto," shall have power or authority to commit any person or persons to the said New Bridewell or house of correction, or to the custody of the keeper thereof, shall be repealed; and that after the passing of this Act the said New Bridewell shall become and be a house of correction for the county of Middlesex, under the management and control of the justices of the said county; and the justices of the said county, the magistrates of the police courts, the judges of the Central Criminal Court, and all persons having by law the right to commit any offender or offenders to the House of Correction in Cold Bath Fields, or to the gaol of Newgate as the common gaol of London and Middlesex, in execution of their judgments, shall have the like power of committal to the said New Bridewell which they have of committing to the said House of Correction or the said gaol of Newgate: provided always, that nothing in this Act contained shall take away the right of the justices for the city and liberty of Westminster and the said commissioners to commit offenders to the said New Bridewell, or enable any of the aforesaid judges, justices, or other persons to commit thereto any offender for any offence committed within the city of London, or elsewhere than in the county of Middlesex.

17. Act may be amended this session.—And be it enacted, That this Act may be amended or repealed by any Act to be passed in this session of Parliament.

This statute, after reciting the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 47, and the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 12, enacts that her Majesty, by order in Council, may reduce the duties to the amounts named in the schedule, on foreign books and prints in cases in which copyright is allowed to the country of export under 7 & 8 Vict. c. 12, and may reduce the duties on books and prints in favour of countries with which her Majesty has treaties of reciprocity. If any treaty be conditional, the order is to state the fulfilment of the condition.

The 3rd section gives power to her Majesty in Council to revoke any orders; the 4th enacts that orders shall be published in the Gazette, and the 5th that they be laid before Parliament.

(August 6, 1844.)

CAP. LXXVI.

An Act to simplify the Transfer of Property. (August 6, 1844.)

CAP. LXXVII.

An Act to amend so much of an Act of the Fifth and Sixth Years of his late Majesty as relates to the Salary of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery; and to make other Provisions in respect of the said Office. (August 6, 1844.)

This statute, after reciting the 5 & 6 Wm. 4, c. 47, whereby the salary of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery was fixed at 500*l.* per annum, and that the increased business imposed upon him had rendered such salary an insufficient remuneration, enacts that the future salary shall be 1,000*l.* per annum. The 2nd section gives to the officers of the Crown-office in Chancery such superannuation allowance as the Treasury shall award, payable out of the fee fund.

CAP. LXXVIII.

An Act to continue for One Year an Act of the Second and Third Years of her present Majesty, intituled "An Act to extend and render more effectual for Five Years an Act passed in the Fourth Year of his late Majesty George the Fourth, to amend an Act passed in the Fiftieth Year of his Majesty George the Third, for preventing the administering and taking Unlawful Oaths in Ireland." CAP. LXXIX.

This statute names a number of new commissioners for every county. It is very long, and needs not to be reprinted here.

CAP. LXXX.

An Act for completing the Guarantee Fund of the South Sea Company, for advancing for the Public Service Part of the unclaimed Stock and Dividends in the Hands of the said Company, and for regulating the Allowance to be paid for the Management of the South Sea Stock Annuities. (August 9, 1844.)

CAP. LXXXI.

An Act for Marriages in Ireland, and for registering such Marriages. (August 9, 1844.)

This is the statute for relieving Presbyterians in Ireland from the disabilities with respect to their marriages which the recent decision of the House of Lords had established. It is very long, consisting of eighty-five sections, and the machinery of registration is resorted to for the purpose by a plan almost exactly like that which regulates the marriages of Dissenters in England. The Act is not of sufficient general interest to justify our devoting to it so large a portion of our space as a reprint of it would occupy.

CAP. LXXXII.

An Act to continue for Five Years so much of an Act of the Second and Third Years of her present Majesty as enables Justices to grant Warrants for entering Places in which Spirits are sold without License in Ireland. (Aug. 9, 1844.)

CAP. LXXXIII.

An Act to amend the Laws relating to Savings Banks, and to the Purchase of Government Annuities through the Medium of Savings Banks. (August 9, 1844.)

We give this statute verbatim.

9 Geo. 4, c. 92; 3 & 4 Wm. 4, c. 14. From and after 20th November, 1844, the interest payable to trustees of savings banks shall be at the rate of 3l. 5s. per cent.—Whereas it is expedient to amend the laws relating to savings banks, and to make other provisions respecting savings banks, and the purchase of Government annuities through the medium of savings banks: and whereas an Act was passed in the ninth year of the reign of his late Majesty King George the Fourth, intituled "An Act to consolidate and amend the Laws relating to Savings Banks;" and another Act was passed in the third year of the reign of his late Majesty King William the Fourth, intituled "An Act to enable Depositors in Savings Banks and others to purchase Government Annuities through the Medium of Savings Banks, and to amend an Act of the ninth year of his late Majesty to consolidate and amend the Laws relating to Savings Banks:" be it therefore enacted by the Queen's most excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, that on the twentieth day of November, one thousand eight hundred and forty-four, the interest payable on the receipts issued to the trustees of savings banks by the commissioners for the reduction of the national debt shall cease, and that from and after the said twentieth day of November all receipts issued prior to that day shall carry interest at the rate of three pounds five shillings per centum per annum; and that from and after the said twentieth day of November, upon the payment of any sum or sums of money into the Banks of England or Ireland, to the account of the said commissioners, by the trustees of any savings bank, it shall be lawful for the officer or officers of the said commissioners in that behalf, and he and they is and are hereby authorized and empowered, to issue, upon every such payment being made, a receipt, signed by one of the cashiers of the Governor and Company of the Banks of England or Ireland respectively, for the amount of such payment, carrying interest at the rate of three pounds five shillings per centum per annum from the day of such payment inclusive, payable, with the principal, at the Banks of England or Ireland respectively, whenever the same shall be required or drawn for in manner directed by the said recited Act; and such receipt shall be dated on the day on which the payment of any such sum or sums of money shall be made respectively; and every such receipt shall be in such form as shall be from time to time directed by the said commissioners; and the principal and interest of all sums mentioned in any receipt shall be charged and chargeable upon, and the same are hereby charged and made payable out of, all or any moneys standing in any account in the names of the said commissioners, or out of any moneys produced by the sale of any stock or annuities, funds, or exchequer bills standing in their names in the books of the Banks of England or Ireland respectively, as the said commissioners shall from time to time direct: Provided always, that no fractional part less than one penny shall be allowed or paid as interest upon the principal sum contained in any receipt issued under the provisions of this Act.

2. After 20th Nov. 1844 interest to depositors not to exceed 3l. 0s. 10d. per cent.—And be it enacted, That from and after the twentieth day of November, one thousand eight hundred and forty-four, the interest payable to the depositors by the trustees or managers of any savings banks shall not exceed the rate of three pounds and ten pence per centum per annum.

4. Punishment of actuary, &c. receiving deposits and not paying over same to managers, &c.—And be it enacted, That if any actuary, cashier, secretary, officer, or other person holding any situation or appointment in any savings bank, shall receive any sum or sums of money from or on account of any depositor or person desirous of becoming such, or on account of such institution, and shall not, at the next day on which the said institution is opened for the receipt of deposits, or in the case of local receivers acting on behalf of any savings bank, shall not within the time specified in the rules of the said institution, account for and pay over the same to the trustees or managers thereof, or to such person as may be directed by the rules of the institution, such actuary, cashier, secretary, officer, or local receiver, or other person as aforesaid, on being convicted thereof, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.

5. Depositor to produce his book at institution.—And be it enacted, That provision shall be made in the rules of every savings bank that every depositor therein shall, once in every year at least, cause his deposit-book to be produced at the office of the said institution for the purpose of being examined.

6. Limiting responsibility of trustees and managers.—And be it enacted, That no trustee or manager of any savings bank shall be liable to make good any deficiency which may hereafter arise in the funds of any savings bank, unless such persons shall have respectively declared, by writing under their hands, and deposited with the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt, that they are willing so to be answerable; and it shall be lawful for each of such persons, or for such persons collectively, to limit his or their responsibility to such sum as shall be specified in any such instrument: provided always that the trustee and manager of any such institution shall be and is hereby declared to be personally responsible and liable for all money actually received by him on account of or to and for the use of such institution, and not paid over or disposed of in the manner directed by the rules of the said institution; and an abstract of the above provisions shall be enrolled as one of the rules of the institution.

7. Trust accounts. Repayment of trust deposits.—And be it enacted, That from and after the twentieth day of November, one thousand eight hundred and forty-four, when deposits shall be made by a trustee on behalf of another, the sum shall be invested in the name of such trustee and the name of the person on whose account such sum shall be so deposited; and repayment of the same or any part thereof shall not be made by the trustees or managers of any savings bank without the receipt and receipts of the said trustee and the person on whose account such deposit may have been made, or the survivor or survivors, or the executors or administrators of such survivor, whose receipt and receipts, either in person or by agent appointed by power of attorney, which power of attorney shall be valid if executed by an infant of or exceeding the age of fourteen years, shall alone be a good and valid discharge to the said trustees and managers, except in case of the insanity or imbecility of the party on whose behalf the deposit has been made, upon proof of which to the satisfaction of the said trustees or managers repayment may be made to the said trustee; and an abstract of the above provisions shall be enrolled as one of the rules of the institution: provided always, that nothing herein contained shall extend or be construed to extend to interfere with any trust accounts opened before the passing of this Act.

STATISTICS OF EMPLOYMENT.

Abstract of Answers and Returns made pursuant to the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 99, and 4 Vict. c. 7, for taking an Account of the Population in England, Wales, and Scotland.—Occupation Abstract, 1841.—Presented to both Houses of Parliament by command of her Majesty.

This is an alphabetical arrangement of all the occupations carried on by the inhabitants of this kingdom, of whatever age or sex, on the 7th of June, 1841, from the personal communications of each individual or head of a family. There are separate returns distinguishing the sex, and whether above or under twenty years of age, for every county in Great Britain, and for all the larger towns, and these are afterwards combined for England and Wales, for Scotland, and for Great Britain generally. The method adopted seems infinitely superior to that used on the occasion of the last census. As the lists of 1831 refer to males only of the age of twenty years and upwards, great care must be observed in using them as a test of the comparative increase of different trades or pursuits in the various localities within the last decennial period. To the return is prefixed a very curious and elaborate preface, stating the reason and nature of the classification adopted, and some of the more prominent and remarkable result deducible from the tables themselves. From the general summary of occupations of persons in Great Britain, including army, navy, merchant seamen, &c. it appears that the whole number of persons employed in occupations in Great Britain is 7,094,186; the number of persons of independent means, i. e. who support themselves on their own means without any occupation, 511,440; the number of paupers, in and out door, 137,366, of whom 24,513 males and 22,424 females are under twenty years of age; of beggars, 1,11°. On the whole, including 10,997,865 persons whose occupations are entirely unaccounted for, of which, however, only 2½ per cent. are males above twenty years of age, the grand total of the population of Great Britain is stated at 18,844,434.

For the metropolis the general summary gives as the total of population 1,873,676, of whom 19,400 are paupers and beggars, 1,007,767 unaccounted for, 91,941 returned as of independent means. Some of the more striking returns for the metropolis are under the several heads—"army," 8,043; "aurist," one; "author," 163, of whom 15 are ladies; "barrister and conveyancer," 1,437; "boot and shoemaker," 28,574; "clergyman," 834; "coffeehouse-keeper," 708; "courier," 77, two of whom are women; "newspaper editor, proprietor, or reporter," 175; "gardener," 4,785, of whom 167 are women; "ice dealer," 5; "midwife," 127; "navy," 1,023; "nurse," 4,687, of whom 17 are males of 20 years and upwards, 2 are males under 20 years; "oculist," one; "domestic servant," 168,701; "tailor and breeches maker," 23,517; "West India merchant," one.

It appears that in Great Britain, on the night of the 6th of June, 1841, 22,308 persons slept in barns, tents, pits, and in the open air; 5,016 persons were travelling. The average number of inhabitants to 100 statute acres for England and Wales is 43; for Middlesex and Westmoreland, which are the counties of the highest and lowest averages, the numbers are 873 and 11 respectively. The average annual number of marriages for England and Wales to every 10,000 inhabitants is 78. In Middlesex, which is the most marrying county, it is 93; in Cumberland, which is least so, it is 57. The average of births to every 10,000 for England and Wales is 319; of deaths, 221; of inhabited houses, 1,850. It may be worth noticing that it is in the maritime counties that we find the least comparative mortality.

Few persons are aware of the influence of immigration on the increase of the population of England and Wales. The fact is, the actual is to the natural increase per cent. as 14 to 9 nearly in the ten years 1831—1841, the difference being ascribable to immigration principally, as it seems. The returns also shew curious results with reference to the transfer of the population from one part of England to the other, which appears to be constantly taking place. Of 100 marriages about eight take place with both parties under age. Middlesex, Surrey, and Devonshire are the most prudent counties in this respect, and generally it is remarkable that the agricultural counties furnish the greatest proportion of early marriages. The number of persons signing the marriage register by marks is considered by the commissioners as a fair criterion of the state of education; if so, Middlesex, Surrey, and Westmoreland are the best educated counties. Westmoreland is considerably the most favourable to infant life of any county in England. Next stands Hampshire, Dorset, Devonshire, and Cornwall; the least favourable is the East Riding of Yorkshire. Classing occupation under the heads of agricultural and commercial (the latter including trade and manufactures), we find the agricultural class forms not quite 8 per cent. of the population, while commercial pursuits employ 16½ per cent. or rather more than double. The greatest difference occurs in Lancashire and Middlesex, in which the commercial class includes respectively 28 and 20 per cent. of the whole population, and the agricultural only 3 and 1 per cent. respectively. The difference is least in Bedford, Dorset, Hertford, Norfolk, Northampton, Salop, and Southampton. The only counties in which the per-centage engaged in agriculture greatly exceeds that employed in commerce are the counties of Essex, Hereford, Huntingdon, Lincoln, and Rutland. The altered proportion which the agricultural bears to the commercial classes in Great Britain is striking. The proportion of the agricultural, commercial, and miscellaneous classes to one another are thus given :—

	Agricultural.	Commercial.	Miscellaneous.
1831	28	42	30

But in 1841 the numbers stood respectively 22, 46, 32. It is a curious fact, that in some counties more labourers are employed under than on the surface of the earth. In Durham there are nearly twice as many miners as labourers employed in cultivating the soil. The total number of agricultural labourers in Great Britain of both sexes is 1,138,563. The commissioners consider that there has been a small increase in the number of persons engaged in agriculture as compared with 1831. The number of persons to whom the cotton manufacture gave employment in June 1841 they compute as near upon half a million. This includes those returned under the heads of "lace" and "hose." Of persons actually engaged in the manufacture of cotton, the return is 302,376, and it would appear that there was no such preponderance of women and children as has been supposed. The males above 20 years of age out of the above number are more than double the number under 20, and considerably exceed the total of females above 20, who, in their turn, exceed by a third the females under 20. The proportion of very young persons employed appears to be progressively diminishing. In the woollen manufacture the number of adult males employed is three times as great as that of the adult women. The number of either sex under 20 is comparatively small. The same may be said of the hose trade; but in the flax and linen manufactures the preponderance is not quite so great. In the silk manufacture the numbers of both sexes employed are nearly equal, the excess among adults being with the males, and under 20 with the females. The manufacture of lace is the only one in which the number of females is very much greater than that of males. The total number of persons employed upon the textile fabrics forming the staple manufactures of the country may be stated at 453,381 males and 346,865 females; of these 245,055 is put down as the number of both sexes under 20 years of age. Of persons employed in mines in Great Britain, and isles in the British seas, 2,662 are females of 20 years of age and upwards, 2,628 females under 20; in Scotland, the numbers respectively are, 440 and 403. The whole number of persons so employed in Great Britain, &c. is 173,268; in Scotland, 20,557; together, 193,825; being nearly an eighth of those employed in the cultivation of the surface. There are 16,550 persons returned as employed in the manufacture of engines and machines. The inmates of workhouses in England and Wales and the British Isles are in the proportion of 62 for every 10,000 persons of the entire population.

For Scotland, the total population is returned at 2,620,184, of whom 58,291 are described as of independent means, and 17,779 as beggars, paupers, pensioners, and alms-people. These are some of the principal results of these returns, which will amply reward examination, for they teem with materials for deciding many questions of intense interest.

The Poor Law.—A Parliamentary return has just been obtained by Mr. E. Barneby, the member for East Worcestershire, of some interest to those concerned in the administration of parish relief. It is entitled, "A Copy of Mr. Weale's Reports to the Poor Law Commissioners, relating to the Parishes calling themselves the Brassington Incorporation," and from it it appears that the incorporation, consisting of twenty-one parishes, was dissolved by an order of the Poor Law Commissioners dated March 15, 1837, and on the 22nd of May, 1844, Mr. Weale, an Assistant Poor Law Commissioner, commenced an examination of the overseer's accounts of that incorporation previous to the formation of the Ashbourne Union, in which he intended to include fourteen of the parishes formerly comprised in the Brassington Incorporation. The overseers contend that the incorporation has not been legally dissolved, on the ground that the consent was not signed by a majority of the guardians of the incorporation amounting to two-thirds; for this reason, coupled, perhaps, with considerable distaste for the interference of the commissioners, the overseers appear to have placed a good many obstacles in the way of Mr. Weale, and each one, when called upon to be examined, served him with the following protest:—"I hereby protest against your right to examine me this day or at any time till the Brassington Incorporation is legally dissolved." Mr. Weale, however, persisted in his right, and subsequently examined several of the overseers upon oath. From these examinations Mr. Weale discovered several inaccuracies in the accounts, and he observes that "they are kept in a very irregular manner, and have never been exhibited to the visitor, as required by Gilbert's Act, and I need not add that they contain many illegal items." Amongst the items in the accounts particularly alluded to, is the following, collected from the evidence of the overseer of Hollington: Four girls, between the age of thirteen and fifteen, who were chargeable to the parish, were placed by the overseer with a silk manufacturer, and their joint wages amounted to 9s. 9d. per week; they were then placed with a woman who provided them with food and lodging, in return for which she received the wages of the children and 2s. 3d. per week extra from the parish, making her remuneration 12s. per week for all the children: the parish also found the clothes. The woman with whom the children were placed did not appear to have been of the most immaculate character; and though a vestry meeting was held upon the subject of placing the children with her, no certificate was produced as to her character, but the overseer who placed them with her represented her as a clean and tidy woman. "This examination," says Mr. Weale, "will itself explain my object in bringing it under your notice." The next item was as follows.—"Paid a casual payment as was agreeable to the ratepayers, having had a magistrate's advice about it, 10*l.*" From the evidence, which was rather contradictory, it appears that the money was paid to a farmer for the support of a bastard child of a young woman resident in the parish; the woman married either on the day the payment was made or very soon after; the money has since been paid over to the husband, who now supports the child. Mr. Weale, remarking upon "this extraordinary item of expenditure," observes, "It is, I think, quite obvious that the object of this payment was to get rid of the mother and child, and to throw the responsibility of their support on other parties." The report continues,—"I also found one instance of an illegal payment, viz. for catching moles, charged as relief." The entry is, "Allsop, Joseph, fifty-two weeks at 9¾d.—2*l.* 2s. 3d." The overseer stated, that that sum was paid for catching moles; it was not entered as it had been to cover an illegal payment. The mole-catcher would have been a pauper if he had not been employed and paid by the parish for catching moles. In a subsequent part of the paper it is pretty clearly confirmed that the woman who had the care of the four girls was an improper person to be entrusted with such a charge; and it is stated, indeed, that an improper intimacy existed between her and the overseer. The girls had since been removed to a more fitting place. An application, it is stated, will be made, as soon as practicable, by the board of guardians to the Court of Queen's Bench for a rule for a certiorari to remove the order of the commissioners relative to the dissolution of the incorporation into that court for the purpose of having it quashed.

Registration of Voters.—The revision of the list of voters commenced on Monday last, and will be concluded before the end of October. By the Act of last year no barrister is to be paid more than 200*l.* including his expenses, and a fixed sum is now set aside for the purpose of the revision. It appears from a recent Parliamentary return, that in 1840 the number of registered electors in England and Wales for counties was 405,946, and in 1843, 518,187; for boroughs the number in 1840 was 329,426, and in 1843, 338,351, shewing the registered electors for England and Wales in 1839-40 to be 825,372, and in 1842-3 to be 356,538. In Scotland the number in 1840 was 82,531, and in 1843, 85,044. The grand total for Great Britain in 1840 was 907,903, and in 1843, 941,782. The total increase in 1842-3 as compared with 1839-40 was 33,394. It is expected that the list of the present year will be increased by the claims of lodgers to be registered.

POOR LAW SETTLEMENT BILL.

No. III.

The 11th section provides for the examination of paupers prior to removal, much in the same way as at present; complaint being first made by "the overseers" to one or more justices, who will summon the pauper before two or more justices to hear and examine, &c. Not a syllable does this section contain to remove the doubts which have grown up as to how the complaint must be made, and if one overseer may complain for the rest. The section is merely a servile copy of the old law and its defects. The provisions in 49 Geo. 3, c. 124, for examining infirm and sick paupers at home by one justice, who reports to others, are replaced by this section.

To the power of removal after examination and warrant, there is attached a new condition, namely, that "if the overseers within seven days after the making of such warrant, send notice by post or otherwise to the overseers" of the receiving parish, "that such person has become chargeable, and also, within the said seven days, send to the overseers, &c. a copy or counterpart of such warrant of removal, and a statement of the grounds upon which the same was made;" then the removal may as therein provided be made, "but not otherwise." This is not so new; there is no necessity to send the notice of chargeability or order of removal within any specified time. We do not see either any material reason for or against this new rule. Orders of removal ought not to be kept till they are stale; but on the other hand, it is not likely that this would happen to any great degree. The object in getting them is to serve them, and be rid of the burden of the pauper they are intended to remove as soon as possible. It appears, therefore, a useless and harmless provision. The time of removal is so mixed up with appeals, that they will be more conveniently noticed together.

Section 21 properly provides for access to the person directed to be removed by the appellant parish officers, for the purpose of examining him, and also if necessary for removing him to be examined elsewhere at their expense.

Sections 18 and 19 require copies of the examination or depositions upon which warrants of removal have been made to be sent to the clerk of the peace, who is to furnish copies to overseers. This is a proper regulation. But see the restrictions on the use of them afterwards: section 23 provides that they hall be referred to on the trial of appeals, "not as furnishing evidence of the facts therein deposed to except only for the purpose of shewing that the person or persons making such depositions has or have made the statements therein contained, and except only where evidence of the fact of such statements having been made is by law admissible." So far so good, but then comes this extraordinary proviso: "Provided, nevertheless, that on the trial of any such appeal, no warrant of removal shall be quashed or set aside, either wholly or in part, on the ground that such depositions do not furnish sufficient evidence to support, or that any matter therein contained raises an objection to the warrant or the statement of the grounds of removal." But the insufficiency of the evidence to support the order of removal is the best reason for quashing the order; and the depositions shew what the evidence was! If this is to be law, what becomes of the common objection that the "examination is bad on the face thereof?" How is this to be shewn; or how is any insufficient evidence in the examination to be proved but by the examination as contained in these very depositions? If it is intended to do away with all formal objections to the examination upon which orders are made, it ought to be explicitly provided for. This proviso, as it stands, stultifies the foregoing clauses, and is utterly inconsistent with existing law.

5. APPEALS.

As our readers are well aware, the existing law allows parishes to give notice of appeal within twenty-one days after receiving the order of removal, during which time the removing parish must retain the pauper, unless the receiving parish assent to take him; and, in the event of silence, the pauper may be removed at the expiration of the twenty-one days.(a) The receiving parish, though previously silent, may also then, on the actual removal, give notice of appeal.(b) When notice of appeal is given before the twenty-one days have expired, the pauper must remain in the removing parish till the appeal be decided. Section 12 of the Bill re-enacts the provisions of the 4 & 5 Wm. 4, c. 76, s. 79, with this great alteration, viz. that the period of forty days is substituted for twenty-one. What is the reason of this change? Can any of our correspondents tell? Do the authors of the Bill know? Have twenty-one days been found too short a time for parishes to make up their minds whether they will appeal or not? It can hardly be so, for they are not now limited to it; but may wait till after removal takes place. Besides, strangely enough, the new provision gives them in effect no longer time than before. For although section 12 prohibits the pauper from being removed for forty days after the warrant of removal is sent, section 20, with great inconsistency, requires notice of appeal within twenty-one days as before. This really sets all attempts to find a reason for the above change at defiance. The only object in making the removing parish keep the pauper twenty-one days under the present law is, that, until the expiration of that time, it is not certain whether the receiving parish may not appeal; in which case it would be useless trouble and expense to remove the pauper. But when these twenty-one days for consideration, which are given to the receiving parish by the new Bill, as well as the present law, have expired, why is the removing parish to keep the pauper for nineteen days longer? We have tried to divine a reason, but have wholly failed in doing so. The 20th section, however, merely enacts, that if the receiving parish gives notice of appeal during the twenty-one days, it "may appeal to the general or quarter sessions of the peace to be held for the county, city, borough, or place wherein the parish on whose behalf such order(c) was obtained, or any part thereof, doth lie." There is no veto upon an appeal afterwards; the words "and not otherwise," nowhere occur in this section, as they do in section 12, about sending the warrant within seven days, which is thereby made a condition precedent to the power of removal. The doubt left here as to the power of appealing after the twenty-one days are past, is most vicious and inexcusable. It may be said that the parish may still appeal after the actual removal, according to the case of Rex v. Middlesex, above cited. We are not sure of that. Does not that case mainly rest upon the old law of 13 & 14 Chas. 2, c. 12, which this sweeping Bill repeals? Besides, who can determine whether the receiving parish may give notice of appeal during the interval between the twenty-one and the forty days? This siesta of nineteen days, during which it would seem that the whole progress of removal is to be in abeyance, during which every thing is to slumber, except the maintenance of the pauper—may it or may it not be broken into by notice of appeal? Who can tell? The Court of Queen's Bench, peradventure, which must clearly sit through half the vacations to dispose of all the doubts this precious measure will furnish for its solution.

Section 22 provides that the appeal be heard at the sessions held next after fourteen days have expired from the sending of the notice of appeal. It also provides that both parties shall adhere to the grounds of removal and appeal set forth in their respective examination and grounds of appeal. This is intended to amend and replace, in substance, the 81st section of the Poor Law Act, which provides that the appeal may be heard when the grounds of appeal shall be sent "with the notice of appeal, or fourteen days at least before the first day of the sessions at which such appeal is intended to be tried." According to the present Act, there is no necessity to send notice of appeal at any fixed time before the sessions; and if the grounds accompany the notice, that will suffice; or if the grounds go alone, they must be sent fourteen days before the sessions.(d) This section 22 of the new Bill will, on the other hand, allow of the grounds being sent the day before the sessions, so long as the notice precedes them by fourteen days. This is not the intention, but is another result of the ignorant and clumsy manner in which this Bill is drawn. The object is a good one, and what was meant to be provided was, that the appeal should be heard at the sessions "held next after the expiration of fourteen days from the day on which the notice of appeal, together with the statement of the grounds of appeal, were given." This would make one uniform practice, and dispense with having recourse to the fluctuating and anomalous rules of different Quarter Sessions, as to what is reasonable notice.

We had intended to have concluded our remarks on this measure to-day, but we prefer taking another week ere we offer our final judgment upon the defects and merits of a measure which must so materially affect the parishes of England.

POOR LAW PRACTICE.

RELIEF.—1. CHARGEABILITY OF.

Feb. 7, 1844.

Clerk of the Auckland Union—Stated, that Robert Stewart, a coke-burner at Hunwick colliery, had fractured his thigh, and he was in consequence confined to his lodgings, situate in the township of Hunwick, in the Auckland union, and had become chargeable to that township. Stewart had a wife and four children; who were residing four miles distant from Hunwick, in the township of Bishop Auckland, in the same union, where they had become chargeable, in consequence of Stewart's inability to support them. Stewart lived with his family in Bishop Auckland, but had lodgings at Hunwick for the convenience of his work, where he remained from Monday morning till Saturday evening, spending the rest of the time with his family at Bishop Auckland. Inquired which of the two townships were liable to maintain Stewrrt and his family, or if the duty of maintaining them rested with the townships in which they respectively resided.

Ans.—The commissioners are of opinion that, under the circumstances stated in your letter, the relief of Robert Stewart should be charged to the township of Hunwick, where he was abiding at the time of the accident (see Gent. v. Tomkins, T. T. 1822, and Tomlinson v. Bentall, 1 Bott. 396), and where he has since remained; and that the relief of his wife and family should be charged to the township of Bishop Auckland, in which they live. The 56th section of the Poor Law Amendment Act certainly provides that the relief given to the wife and children shall be considered as given to the head of the family; but this provision does not appear to the commissioners to interfere with the primary liability, cast by the general law upon each parish, to afford relief to every person destitute within its boundaries. The result will be, that Stewart will be chargeable to Hunwick, in respect of his own relief, and to Bishop Auckland, in respect of the relief afforded to his wife and family.

2. OUT-DOOR RELIEF TO BASTARD CHILDREN.

Clerk of Ticehurst Union—Requested the opinion of the commissioners on the following points—1. Whether out-relief may (if the guardians think proper) be granted to an illegitimate child, born before the passing of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 4 & 5 Wm. 4, c. 76, such child being resident with its mother. 2. Whether in such case, the power to give out-relief to such child would be altered, by the fact of the mother having had another illegitimate child, born since the passing of the Poor Law Amendment Act. The clerk presumed that the ground upon which out-relief to an illegitimate child, born subsequent to the passing of the Act referred to, was illegal was, that under the 71st section of that Act—"all relief granted to such child, while under the age of sixteen, shall be considered as granted to such mother," and she being able-bodied, could not legally receive out-relief, under the commissioners' order relating to out-relief. A question had been asked whether such child would be entitled to out-relief, in case the mother was not able-bodied, or certified as labouring under sickness or illness.

Ans.—You have correctly stated the grounds on which out-relief to a bastard child becomes illegal, viz.—that under the 71st section of the Poor Law Amendment Act, relief to such child, if born subsequently to the passing of the Act, is relief to its mother, and under the commissioners' regulations, out-relief to able-bodied persons is unlawful. These being the only grounds for the illegality, it is needless to remark that, where these grounds do not exist, the illegality will not prevail. Consequently, the replies to your several questions will be as follows:—1. Out-relief may (if the guardians think fit) be granted to an illegitimate child, born before the passing of the Poor Law Amendment Act, whether such child be resident with its mother or not; 2. The power to give out-relief to such child would not be affected by the circumstance of the mother's having had another illegitimate child, born since the passing of the Poor Law Amendment Act. Out-relief, even to a bastard born since the passing of the Act, would not be unlawful, if the mother be not able-bodied, or if her case fall within any of the exceptions to the commissioners' order as to out-door relief.

TREASURER.

APPOINTMENT OF TREASURER AS OVERSEER.

April 24, 1844.

Treasurer of the Shaftesbury Union — Inquired whether, as Treasurer of the Shaftesbury Union, he was exempt from serving the office of overseer for a parish in that union.

Ans.—The commissioners are not aware that the treasurer of a union is exempt as such from serving the office of overseer. Whether there is any such incompatibility between the two offices, as would render it undesirable for the same person to hold both, is a question for the justices to consider, when appointing the overseers.

EVIDENCE.

LIABILITY OF RELIEVING OFFICER TO PRODUCE HIS BOOKS BEFORE JUSTICES, UNDER A CROWN OFFICE SUBPŒNA.

Feb. 12, 1844.

Clerk of Eastbourne Union—Stated, that one of the relieving officers of the Eastbourne union had been served with a Crown-office subpœna duces tecum, to attend before the justices, and to produce the application and report books, weekly relief lists, and any other documents containing entries of relief to one Elizabeth Stevens, or otherwise relating to the settlement of Daniel Stevens and Sarah his wife. The board of guardians considered that they were not justified in allowing the books and documents required to be produced, as the board regarded them to be of a privileged nature, and not liable to be called for as evidence in cases of settlement. The overseers of a parish could not be required to produce their books in evidence against themselves, or their own parish, and the board of guardians felt that they ought not to place parishes in a worse situation than they would have been, if the relief of the poor had not been taken out of the hands of the overseers. Requested the commissioners to advise the board how to act in the matter.

Ans.—The commissioners think it incumbent on the relieving officer to attend the justices, in obedience to the subpœna, and to produce such books and documents enumerated as are in his power and custody. The commissioners apprehend that, under the like authority, the overseers of any parish in the union would be bound to attend and produce any documentary evidence in their power, though the production of such evidence might be to establish a settlement in their parish. It will be for the justices, before whom the parties attend, to decide whether any of the evidence produced under such authority, is privileged.

MEDICAL RELIEF.

JUSTICES' POWER TO ORDER MEDICAL RELIEF.

March 1, 1844.

Chairman of the Bedford Union—Inquired, 1. Whether a justice of the peace was empowered to give an order for medical relief in a case of sudden and dangerous illness, before the overseer had been applied to for an order, and had refused or neglected to give one. 2. Whether a justice of the peace, when required to give an order for medical relief, in a case of sudden and dangerous illness, and after the overseer had been applied to for an order, and had refused to give one, ought to address his order to the overseer, or immediately to the medical officer of the district. 3. Whether a justice of the peace, before he grants an order for medical relief, in a case of sudden and dangerous illness, was required to summon the overseer, to shew cause why he refused to give one.

Ans.—1. The commissioners think that the 54th section of the Poor Law Amendment Act enables a justice of the peace to give an order for medical relief (only) in any case of sudden and dangerous illness in which such relief may be requisite, whether the overseers have or have not previously refused to give such relief. The first proviso in the section clearly refers to the immediately antecedent clause, requiring overseers to give relief "in cases of sudden and urgent necessity;" and it limits the justice's power in such cases to those instances in which the overseer refuses or neglects to perform his duty; but the second proviso has reference to a different class of cases, and empowers the justice to give an order for medical relief, &c., "where any case of sudden and dangerous illness may require it." Some doubt may possibly arise from the description of the order, in the second proviso, as a "similar order;" but the commissioners apprehend that this expression was intended to indicate merely the character of the order itself, and not the occasion for its issuing. 2. The commissioners consider that the phrase "similar order" has the effect of requiring that the order for medical relief, under the second proviso, should be like the order for temporary relief in articles of necessity, authorized by the first proviso; that is to say, that it should be made upon the overseer of the parish, by a justice of the peace, in writing under his hand and seal. This view is placed beyond doubt by the subsequent clause, "And any overseer shall be liable to the penalties as aforesaid for disobeying such order." 3. The commissioners' answer to your first inquiry will intimate their opinion that the justice, before granting an order for medical relief, need not call upon the overseer to shew cause why he refused to give such relief; although of course the justice will be bound to satisfy himself that the case is really one of illness so sudden and dangerous as to justify his making an order on the overseers.

Summary.

THE first of a series of articles upon the important Transfer of Property Act will be found under the head of Property Lawyer. In the succeeding articles the details of the Act and the probable effect of the alterations will be examined at greater length. Memoranda for Lawyers.

Evidence—Pedigree.

Davies, demandant, Lowndes, tenant, which is the last writ of right that can ever be brought, has given occasion to a vast display of obsolete learning, and incidentally to an important discussion and judgment upon the nature of evidence respecting pedigrees. The whole case upon this and other points is reported at great length in 7 Scott, N. R. 141; but the facts, so far as they bear upon this subject, are given in the following extracts from the judgment of the Court of Error, delivered by Lord Denman, reversing the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas:—

Upon the fourth exception, after much doubt and full consideration, we come to the conclusion that part, if not all, of the document offered in evidence by the demandant was admissible. The document in question was intituled "The Genealogie of the Lloyds of Cwm Gloyne, county of Pembroke, shewing their descent from the Prince of Wales, together with some colaterale Branches of the same Family" The pedigree was traced from the Lord of Rhys, Prince of South Wales, who died 1233, to a William Lloyd, of Treviggin, living in 1733. It stated in one of the accounts of one of the collateral branches, the marriage of the sister of William Lloyd's grandfather to a Thomas Selby, from whom the demandant alleged that Thomas James Selby, the testator, was descended; and it also stated that Erasmus Lloyd was his cousin, and the marriage of the daughter of his great grandfather's brother with a person of the name of Ellis; and, as evidence of both these facts, was material to the demandant's case. At the foot of it was a memorandum in these words:—"Collected from parish registers, wills, monumental inscriptions, family records, and history. This account is now presented as correct, and as confirming of the tradition handed down from one generation to another, to Thomas Lloyd, esq. of Cwm Gloyne, this 4th day of July, Anno Domini 1733, by his loving kinsman, &c. William Lloyd." The signature was proved to correspond with that to the will of William Lloyd, one of the ancestors of the demandant named in the count. On the back of the document was an indorsement in these words:—"A true account of my Family and Origin, Thomas Lloyd, Cwm Gloyne;" and it was proved by a living witness that this document was found by him fifty years ago amongst the papers of the Cwm Gloyne family, in a drawer in the mansion house of the Cwm Gloyne estate, which had devolved upon him; and the witness proved the indorsement to be in the handwriting of Thomas Lloyd, of Cwm Gloyne.

The document was insisted upon by the counsel for the demandant as being altogether admissible. The Court rejected it. It was then offered as admissible in part, viz. as evidence of the pedigree of the first collateral branch; and rejected: then as evidence to prove who the grandfather of William Lloyd was; and rejected: then as evidence to shew who the father of William Lloyd was; but, the counsel for the tenant admitting that fact, that portion of the document also was rejected. Then it was contended that the portion which stated who the paternal uncles and first cousins of William Lloyd were, was admissible: it was rejected. Then the demandant's counsel tendered those parts which shewed that William Lloyd's uncle John died a bachelor, and that his uncle George had certain children then living: these also were rejected. Then, lastly, he offered such part as shewed a marriage of Henry Lloyd's sister with Ellis; and the Court rejected that also; holding no part to be legally admissible; and the question is whether that decision was right. It appears to us that it was not.

It does not admit of any doubt that this pedigree, if it had been signed by William Lloyd, with the date 1733 and without any memorandum of his, and had borne the memorandum indorsed by Thomas, would have been altogether admissible, independently of the objection of its having been written post litem motam, which will hereafter be considered. The signature of William Lloyd, one of the family of the demandant, would have been equivalent to a declaration of the relationship of the persons therein mentioned, including the marriage of a Selby with a Lloyd, and would have been evidence to connect the family of the demandant with that of the tenant—see the judgment of Lord Brougham in Monkton v. The Attorney-General (2 Russ. & M. 156): and the signature of Thomas Lloyd of Cwm Gloyne would have amounted to a similar recognition by another member of the same family. But it is argued that the memorandum of William Lloyd places this pedigree upon a different footing, and renders it altogether inadmissible. If this were so, there would still be a question what the meaning of Thomas Lloyd's indorsement, coupled with the fact of its preservation by him, was. If the words, "A true account of my Family and Origin," were written on the back of the document merely as denoting what its contents were—a sort of index to it—the indorsement would not amount to a recognition by Thomas of its correctness, and would not render it admissible, on the footing of its being equivalent to a declaration by Thomas. If the words were intended to mean that the writer had satisfied himself of the correctness of William's statement, from independent sources of information, that is, from his own knowledge and the tradition prevailing in his own branch of the family, then the whole pedigree would have been admissible as a declaration by one of the family of Cwm Gloyne. There is some evidence of such a recognition to go to the jury for their consideration; and this would be a ground for a venire de novo: but, passing by that objection, and adverting to the memorandum of William only, the question is, whether that memorandum destroys the effect of his recognition, and renders it wholly in admissible in evidence, as the Lord Chief Justice and the Judges of the Common Pleas have decided.

The ground of that decision appears to have been, that the memorandum bore upon the face of it a sort of certificate that the statement in the pedigree was merely secondary evidence of existing originals from which it was compiled, and that the absence of those originals was not accounted for; and that, if any part of the pedigree was derived from legitimate sources, viz. personal knowledge or family tradition, it did not appear distinctly which was such part, and, therefore, the whole was inadmissible. We think this view of the case is not correct.

A pedigree, whether in the shape of a genealogical tree or map, or contained in a book, or mural or monumental inscription, if it is recognized by a deceased member of the same family, is admissible, however early the period from which it purports to have been deduced. On what ground is this admitted? It may be because the simple act of recognition of the document, and consequent acknowledgment of the relationship stated in it, by a member of the family, is some evidence of that relationship, from whatever sources his information may have been derived, because he was likely, from his situation, both to inquire into the truth of such matters, and from his means of knowledge to ascertain it. The opinion of Lord Cottenham, in Slaney v. Wade (1 Mylne & C. 335), as well as that of Lord Brougham, in Monkton

v. The Attorney General (2 Russ. & M. 156), are in favour of this view of the case.

But the reason why a pedigree, when made or recognized by a member of a family, is admissible, may be that it is presumably made or recognized by him in consequence of his personal knowledge of the individuals therein stated to be relations, or of information received by him from some deceased member of what he himself knew or heard from other members who lived before his time. And, if so, it may well be contended, that, if the facts rebut that presumption, and shew that no part of the pedigree was derived from proper sources of information, then the whole of it ought to be rejected: and so also, if there be some, but an uncertain and undefined part, derived from improper sources. But, where the framer speaks of individuals whom he describes as living, we think the reasonable presumption is that he knew them, and spoke of his own personal knowledge, and not from reference to registers, wills, monumental inscriptions, and family records, or history; and, consequently, to that extent the statements in the pedigree are derived from a proper source, and are good evidence of the relationship of those persons.

The pedigree had further been objected to as having been made post litem motam; but this objection was held to be inapplicable, as there could not have been a lis mota before 1772, and the instrument was dated in 1733; and according to the cases of Anderson v. Weston (6 B.N.C. 296) and Smith v. Battens (1 M. & Rob. 341), the date of an instrument must be presumed primâ facie to be correct; and certainly that is the presumption where the instrument, as this, was dated thirty years ago or upwards, and its custody accounted for.

It became unnecessary, therefore, to consider the exact meaning of lis mota, whether it be the mere existence of the facts as laid down by Alderson, B. in Walker v. Earl of Beauchamp (6 C. & P. 552), or whether there must not be, not merely facts which may lead to a dispute, but such a lis mota or suit or controversy preparatory to a suit actually commenced, or dispute arisen (in the language of Mr. Justice Lawrence, in the Berkeley Peerage case, 4 Camp. 491), and that upon the same question, or on the same pedigree, or subject-matter, which is now in litigation. This is a question of considerable importance which remains undecided.

THE PROPERTY LAWYER.

Execution of power of appointment by will. What is "signing, sealing, and publishing in the presence of and attested by three or more credible witnesses."

We lately gave an interesting case upon the execution of a leasing power (supra, p. 332), and in a recent number of Scott's excellent reports is contained a full report of the cases of Burdett v. Doe dem. Spilsbury and Another, and Skynner and Others v. Doe dem. Spilsbury and Another (7 Scott, N. R. 66, 140) to which we now wish to draw the attention of our readers :—

"Lands were limited to such uses, &c. as L. H. S. should appoint by her last will and testament in writing, to be by her signed, sealed, and published in the presence of and attested by three or more credible witnesses. L. H. S. (before the statute 7 Wm. 4 & 1 Vict. c. 26) signed and sealed an instrument containing an appointment, commencing thus—'I, L. H. S. do publish and declare this to be my last will and testament,' and concluding—'I declare this only to be my last will and testament: in witness whereof I have to this my last will and testament set my hand and seal this 12th of December, 1789.' The attestation was as follows—'Witness. C. B., E. B., A. B.'"

In 1834 these actions of ejectment were tried, and verdicts found for the plaintiffs, subject to the opinion of the Court of King's Bench upon special cases. These cases were determined in favour of the defendants (4 Ad. & El. 1; 6 N. & M. 259), and were then turned into special verdicts. Judgment was given pro formâ for the defendants, but reversed in the Exchequer Chamber (9 Ad. & El. 936; 1 P. & D. 670). Error was brought in the House of Lords, and Sir W. Follett and Pemberton argued for the plaintiffs in error, and Sir F. Pollock and Bethel for the defendants in error.

The cases cited on both sides are set forth in the opinions of the judges, from which we propose to give copious extracts. They were delivered June 19, 1843, and, in accordance with the majority, these long-litigated cases were decided August 18, 1843.

"WIGHTMAN, J.—My Lords, upon the questions referred by your Lordships to the consideration of the judges, whether the will of Lydia Henning Skynner, stated in the special verdict, is or is not a good execution of the power contained in her marriage settlement, I am of opinion that it is. By the power she is enabled to devise by her last will and testament, or any writing purporting to be such, 'to be by her signed, sealed, and published in the presence of and attested by three or more credible witnesses.' An instrument in writing, purporting to be the last will and testament of Lydia Henning Skynner was in fact signed, sealed, and published by her in the presence of three witnesses, and was attested by them by writing their names under the word 'witness.' The power does not require any form of attestation, but only that the instrument should be attested by three witnesses, in whose presence it should be signed, sealed, and published by the testatrix. No distinction can, I think, be drawn between the words 'witness' and 'attest;' nor does it appear to me that it would have made any difference, if, instead of the words 'in the presence of and attested by three or more witnesses,' the expression had been 'in the presence of and witnessed by three or more witnesses:' and the case may be considered the same as if, instead of the word 'witness' written over the names of the three persons subscribing, the words had been 'attested by' those three persons. The power, then, is literally complied with in its terms by the instrument in question; it does purport to be the last will and testament of Lydia Henning Skynner; it was signed, sealed, and published by her in the presence of three witnesses; and the three witnesses did attest the instrument—by subscribing their names to it as such. But it is said, that, when the power required the instrument to be attested by three witnesses, in whose presence the testatrix was to sign, seal, and publish it, more was necessary to fulfil that requisition than that they should merely write their names as witnesses. The power requires them to be witnesses of three things—signing, sealing, and publication; and it is said that the granter of the power intended, when he required the will to be made in a certain manner, in the presence of three witnesses, and to be attested by them, that, to fulfil that requisition of the power which requires the attestation of three witnesses, they ought in terms to mention that they did witness the performance of the three things required to be done by the testatrix; and that the merely signing their names as witnesses is not enough, though they did in fact see all the formalities performed. Independently of particular authorities, to which I shall presently allude, it appears to me that this objection is not well founded. The power requires that the instrument should be signed, sealed, and published by the testatrix in the presence of three witnesses, and that they should attest the instrument. No form of attestation would have dispensed with the necessity, for the first thirty years, of calling one of the subscribing witnesses, if any were alive or in a situation to be called, to prove that the formalities required by the power had been complied with; but, after thirty years, the case would rest upon the presumption arising upon the production of the instrument itself. In the present case, the instrument shews a general attestation of it by three witnesses, without any statement of the particular facts they attested; but they must be understood to have attested something; and, to ascertain what that is, there is no principle of law, nor any authority, of which I am aware, that prohibits a reference to the instrument itself: and if we look at the instrument for information as to that which it is to be presumed the witnesses did attest or witness, what do we find? Upon the face of the instrument which the witnesses attest the testatrix says, 'I do publish and declare this to be my last will and testament. In witness whereof I have set my hand and seal to this my last will and testament;' and then follows a signature and seal purporting to be those of the testatrix. Can it be doubted but that the jury might presume that the witnesses, who do not specify what they saw, did see all that done which on the face of the instrument appears to have been done, and which it was requisite for the testatrix to do to make a perfect instrument? But, supposing such a special form of attestation as that contended for to have been adopted, it would not have varied the character of the evidence derived from the terms of the instrument and the general attestation of the witnesses; it would but have raised a presumption for the jury that they did witness that which is stated in the attestation, subject to any doubt that might be raised as to whether they really did witness that which is stated in the written attestation or not. The statute of frauds requires that all wills of lands should be signed by the party devising, and be attested and subscribed in the presence of the devisor by three or four witnesses; but there is no doubt but that a general attestation would satisfy the statute. In the case of Hands v. James (Com. Rep. 531), it was decided, that, where all the witnesses to a will were dead, and it did not appear in the attestation clause that the witnesses set their names in the presence of the testatrix, it was a question for the jury, which they might determine upon circumstances, whether it was so or not; and the Court, in coming to that conclusion, say that the witnesses are required by the statute of frauds to set their names in the presence of the testator, but that the statute does not require that this should be noticed in the subscription of the witnesses; and in Croft v. Pawlet (2 Stra. 1109, it was held, upon the authority of Hands v. James, that a will of lands may be well executed, though it is not stated in the attestation that the witnesses signed in the presence of the testator. The same point was also decided in Brice v. Pearse (Willes, 1). Independently, then, of express authority, and upon general principles, and with reference to the execution of wills under the statute of frauds, the terms of the power appear to have been complied with."

But, continued the learned judge, "It is said that there is a series of decisions to the contrary, and unless these cases could be distinguished from the present I should certainly not venture to give it as my opinion to your lordships that this power has been well executed." He then examined the cases at length as follows :—

"The first of these is the case of Wright v. Wakeford (4 Taunt. 213): a deed contained a power for trustees, by consent of cestui que trusts, testified by writing under their hands and seals, attested by two or more credible witnesses, to make sale of certain lands; the cestui que trusts did sign, seal, and deliver a deed testifying their consent to a sale, in the presence of two witnesses, but the attestation was, in terms, of the sealing and delivery only. Upwards of twenty years afterwards, the witnesses added a fresh attestation to the deed, by which they attested the signature also. The case was sent by the Lord Chancellor for the opinion of the Court of Common Pleas, and three of the judges, Heath, J., Lawrence, J. and Chambre, J. held that the power of sale was not well executed, by reason of the omission of any mention of 'signing' in the first attestation, and that the second was of no avail to cure the defect in the first. Lord Chief Justice Mansfield seems to have considered that the first attestation was sufficient, and that the witnesses must be understood to attest the signing; but that at all events the defect (if any) was cured by the second. The decision, therefore, was that of the three other judges I have named, who state the ground upon which they determined the question thus: 'As a question of law, we think it must be determined by the true construction of the terms of the attestation, to which it appears to us that our consideration must be confined; and we do not think that the signature is comprehended in the words made use of in the attestation.' The decision, therefore, turned expressly upon the special form of the attestation, by which the witnesses state in terms what they did attest, excluding thereby any presumption that they witnessed more than is expressly stated. The effect of an attestation in general terms to a deed, which upon the face of it imports that all the requisites of a power have been pursued, was not, and indeed could not, properly be considered in the case of Wright v. Wakeford, which was decided upon a principle which does not apply to such a case: and I have been unable to find one in which it has been held that a general attestation is insufficient where upon the face of the instrument the requisites of the power appear to have been complied with. The case of Doe dem. Mansfield v. Peach (2 M. & S. 576) was determined expressly on the authority of Wright v. Wakeford, and upon facts nearly the same, the power requiring signing as well as sealing and delivering, and there being a special attestation of sealing and delivering only. The case of Wright v. Barlow (3 M. & S. 512) is to the same effect: the power required signing as well as sealing, and there was a special attestation of sealing and delivering only. In Moodie v. Reid (7 Taunt. 355), the power required the will to be signed and published by the testatrix in the presence of and attested by two or more witnesses. The attestation in that case was general, as in the present; the word 'witness' only was used, as in this; but there was nothing on the face of the instrument itself to indicate that it had been published; the words 'publish' or 'declare' are not to be found in it, and nothing more appears upon the whole instrument than that it was signed. In the case of Stanhope v. Keir (2 Sim. & Stu. 37), the power required the will to be signed and published in the presence of and attested by three or more witnesses. The attestation was general, but there was nothing on the face of the instrument to shew that it had been published, though it had been signed. In Buller v. Burt, cited in 4 Ad. & E. 15, the power required the deed to be sealed and delivered in the presence of and attested by the witnesses. The attestation was general, but the instrument only purported to be signed and sealed, and made no mention of delivery. The cases of Moodie v. Reid, Stanhope v. Keir, and Buller v. Burt, therefore, are clearly distinguishable from the present, and within the principle of the other cases, as the witnesses must be taken to attest so much as they appear to have attested, either by reference to the attestation if special, or to the instrument itself if general. The case of Ward v. [illegible] (1 C. & M. 171), which is one of the latest cases upon the subject ject, is not an authority either way; the power required that the will should be duly executed and published in the presence of witnesses, and the attestation was that it was signed, sealed, and delivered as the last will, which was held sufficient. These are the leading authorities upon which it is contended that the power in the present case is not well executed, and that there ought to have been a special attestation. It appears to me that they are all distinguishable upon the grounds I have mentioned, and that they are not authorities to shew that a general attestation to an instrument which on the face of it shews that the formalities required by the power have been complied with, is not sufficient. I should observe here, that there is the direct authority of Sir John Leach, in the case of Buller v. Burt, that, where the attestation is general, as in this case, the instrument which is attested may be referred to, to ascertain from it, if possible, what it was that the witnesses attested. It is said, however, that this could only be available on the presumption that the witnesses read the instrument. This does not, however, appear to me to be the true ground; but that, as the witnesses must be presumed to have attended to witness something, and, as their signature as witnesses shews that they did witness something, the deed may be referred to to raise a presumption that that was done which on the face of it appears to have been done. It may be said, however, that, in the present case, the terms of the instrument, if referred to, raise no such presumption, and that the words 'I do publish and declare this to be my last will and testament' are not sufficient to raise the presumption that the testatrix did publish and declare it. The power requires that she should publish her will in the presence of three witnesses: there are three witnesses to the will, and she says that she does publish it: surely it is to be inferred that she did that which she says she did, and not that she merely wrote the words without doing the act which was essential to the validity of the will. In conclusion, I may add that all or nearly all the learned judges who in the previous stages of this case have expressed an opinion contrary to that which I entertain, have founded their judgment on the case of Wright v. Wakeford, with some expression of regret that that case had been so decided: it may therefore be presumed, that, but for that case, and those founded upon it, they would have been of a contrary opinion. Upon the whole, it appears to me that those cases are entirely distinguishable from the present, and that the power is well executed."

THE ACT TO SIMPLIFY THE TRANSFER OF PROPERTY (7 & 8 Vict. c. 76).

No. I.

Having some weeks since laid before our readers a copy of the above Act, we shall now proceed, in fulfilment of the promise we then gave, to make some comments upon it.

The announcement of an Act to "simplify" the very complex machine of our conveyancing system naturally excited great interest, and no little alarm, in the conveyancing ranks of the Profession. For some years past the legal world has been from time to time agitated by a variety of crude and incongruous schemes, propounded principally by parties having little practical acquaintance with the subject, with the view of effecting changes and so-called improvements in the mode of transferring property in this country. Our readers no doubt will remember the famous plan of Lord Campbell for that purpose; according to which the present difficulties of drafting were to be overcome, and the attendant evils of length, tautology, intricacy, and expense were to be remedied, by a short tabular form, "neatly and clearly arranged;" a plan which had the singular fate of being universally condemned and unanimously rejected, not only by practitioners, but also by all legal reformers, with the solitary exception of his lordship. At the beginning of the last session, a measure was introduced by the Lord Chancellor with a similar object, but of a widely different character, containing about thirty clauses, many of them of a sweeping and startling kind, and threatening serious interference with established principles. In its course, unperceived by, and, indeed, comparatively unknown to, the Profession at large, through the House of Lords, the Bill was materially reduced and curtailed, and several of the obnoxious clauses were expunged. Towards the close of the session, it appeared in its altered shape in the House of Commons, and was driven through its various stages there with the indecorous haste which in these times of dog-day legislation is unfortunately so fashionable. The consequence was, it became the law of the land before the majority of those who might be affected by its provisions, and were competent to criticise it, had an idea of its contents. Such is the history of the Act before us: an Act which, if it bore out its title, would be one of vast importance, and concern every holder of property in the country as well as the legal profession. We think, however, we may assure our readers that the title is by far the most formidable part of the Act; that, in fact, little change will be effected by it—and, moreover, we fear that in some respects it will be found to contradict rather than to affirm its title. In the observations which we propose to make, it will be our aim not to discuss the expediency or inexpediency of the provisions of the Act (for the time has passed for doing so with any utility), but to point out what, according to our present views, will be its operation in practice. Of course any remarks upon the probable working of an untried Act must be offered with great distrust, from experience of the difficulty of deciding beforehand what in any given case will be the view taken by the legal tribunals of the country—what principles of interpretation they will adopt—whether a limited or a liberal construction will be given to particular provisions, or whether the language will be strained in deference to some apparent or presumed intention, or be confined within the range of its strict literal meaning.

Our readers are already aware that the Act will not come into operation until the 1st of January next. It will not have a retrospective effect, except in one particular, viz. as regards contingent remainders then existing, which are rendered indestructible by the determination of the prior estates. Until the 1st of January, then, no change is authorized except the omission of the common limitation to trustees to preserve contingent remainders; and after that time no alteration of the common forms now in use is required, for the Act leaves it at the option of the practitioner in every case either to avail himself of its provisions, or to continue the present practice. If he adopt the latter alternative, his deeds will be construed by the rules now in force, and must, therefore, be accompanied with every formality which is now required.

The Act not being constructed upon any regular system, but consisting mainly of isolated and independent clauses, with little or no mutual bearing, the more convenient plan of commenting upon it will be to take the clauses seriatim. This we shall proceed to do in our next article.

LEGAL INTELLIGENCE.

LEGAL PROTECTIVE ASSOCIATION.

By the full report we gave in a recent number of the first general meeting of the Legal Protective Association, we afforded our readers an opportunity of judging for themselves of its nature and objects. We are informed that its numbers are daily increasing, and many members of the Law Institution have joined it; thus bearing out our observation, that there need be no hostility or opposition between the two bodies.

Some of the provincial Law Societies have, we understand, already shewn a desire to unite cordially with it.

One of the proposed alterations that the Association intends to advocate is, we believe, a diminution of the annual certificate, and an increase of the admission stamp-duty. The next meeting of the committee is looked for with interest, as many are naturally unwilling to send their names as members until they are fully satisfied with their objects and system and operation. It is needless for us to say that we heartily wish for the establishment of a society in which all parties may unite, and where the interests of the country, as well as the town members of the Profession, will be adequately represented and harmoniously supported; and we shall therefore watch the progress of this association with the greatest interest.

MIDDLESEX SESSIONS.

Friday, Sept. 13.

(Before Mr. Deputy Judge Walesby.)

Extraordinary Scene.—Conviction of a Sham Attorney.—Francis Crocker, aged 63, was indicted for stealing a gold ring, the property of Mary Judd.

O'Brien appeared for the prosecution, and Payne defended the prisoner.

From the evidence of the prosecutrix, it appeared that she had been courted by a young man of the name of Abell, who purchased a wedding ring and settled the preliminaries of marriage, but afterwards broke off his engagements, Abell having married another female. On the 13th of August the prisoner introduced himself, and having obtained possession of a bundle of broken promises and vows of affection, he described himself as a solicitor, and said he should not require any money until after the writ was issued, but that the wedding-ring would be necessary for the case. He then sealed up the ring in a letter, and gave the prosecutor the following memorandum:—"Miss Judd has deposited in my hands a gold ring, purchased by Mr. Abell, and which I promise to return, on her paying me 15s. for expenses already incurred in an action brought against Mr. Abell for breach of promise of marriage." On the 21st of August, the prosecutrix paid the 15s. to the prisoner, and demanded the ring, which he promised to return on the following morning; but not keeping his word, the aid of the police was sought, and it was discovered that the prisoner had pawned the ring for four shillings on the very day he had obtained it from the prosecutrix, and that no action had been commenced against Abell.

Payne contended that no larceny had been committed, and that the prisoner had never intended to convert the ring to his own use. He had merely raised a temporary loan upon it, and there was no ground for charging him with felony.

The jury returned a verdict of guilty.

O'Brien said there was another indictment against the prisoner for obtaining 15s. by means of false pretences, but he should offer no evidence upon it.

The prisoner said he had a character, but had not had any pens or paper to write to his friends.

Several of the visiting justices said that they had asked the prisoner during his confinement if he had any application to make.

The prisoner admitted that was true.

Payne said the prisoner had been confined at these sessions two days, and no accommodation was afforded similar to that granted in the prisons.

Mr. Pownall observed that he was glad the subject had been alluded to. The building required great alterations, and he hoped the public would take the matter up. Under the present rules it would have been a breach of prison discipline to have complied with the prisoner's request.

The prisoner declared that he had been dragged from cell to cell in the New Prison by the gaolers, and that his clothes had been torn off his back because he refused to give them money.

Several magistrates indignantly required the prisoner to name or point out the parties, which he was unable to do.

The Judge.—That is another wicked and abominable lie. As soon as I can allay the excitement, I will canvass the opinions of the Bench.

Payne.—You had better delay the judgment, or I am afraid you will be considered labouring under excitement.

The Judge.—I think that a most indecent and uncalled for remark, after the patience I have exhibited in every case I have tried. (Great applause here burst from every part of the court, including the jury-box.)

Payne.—I wish to state—

The Judge (interrupting).—Sit down, Sir; I will not hear you.

Payne.—I wish to apologize, Sir.

The Judge (again interrupting).—I tell you again, Sir, sit down. I don't want any apologies. Sit down, Sir. Sit down. I will maintain the dignity of the Court. (Renewed applause.)

Payne (still on his legs).—Then I have an application to make. I have a right to ask you to postpone the sentence until I produce witnesses to character.

The Judge.—I refuse your application.

Payne.—No other judge ever refused it before.

The Judge.—That is a remark consistent with the ungrateful and indecent manner in which you have conducted the defence throughout. (Great cheering.)

The Judge (addressing the prisoner) said that he had allowed him to go on in order that his brother magistrates might be convinced of the dangerous man they had to deal with. His own opinion was that he ought to be sent out of the country, for he had aggravated his offence by the flagrant lies he had told about the gaoler's receiving garnish money. The sentence of the Court was that he be imprisoned for six months and kept to hard labour in Tothill-fields Prison, six weeks of the term to be passed in solitary confinement.—Herald.

The Queen has been pleased to appoint Thomas Norton, esq. First Puisne Judge of British Guiana, to be Chief Justice of Newfoundland.

The Lord Chancellor of Ireland, the Right Hon. Sir E. B. Sugden, has been placed in mourning by the demise of his eldest son, Mr. Frederick Sugden, who died at Boyle Farm, Thames Ditton, on Thursday, in his 34th year.

Sir William Follett.—Letters were received in town on Monday morning from Germany, which, we rejoice to announce, stated that the learned and distinguished Attorney-General (Sir William Follett), is considered to be better, and that his health is daily improving.—Standard.

Imprisonment for Debt.—The metropolitan prisons for debt present a very different appearance to what they did some time ago. In March last there were 346 persons confined in Whitecross-street Prison, and now there are about 140; in February last there were 262 persons in the Queen's Prison, and now there are about 180; and in Horsemonger-lane Gaol in March there were 112, and now there are between 30 and 40. These alterations are in a great measure to be attributed to the new Act, and it is expected that in a short time one prison instead of three in the metropolis will be found sufficient for prisoners confined for debt. It is calculated that a few years ago there were about 1,200 persons in the London prisons for debt, and there are now somewhere about 360. By two Parliamentary returns (one printed in May last, and the other subsequently) it appears that there were in the United Kingdom 3,352 persons confined for debt, of which number 1,487 were incarcerated for sums, exclusive of costs, of under 10*l.*! In two years, ending 1843, the expense to the country for the maintenance of prisoners for debt was 18,617*l.* 8s. 6¾d.

Flint and Cut Glass.—Doubts having been entertained whether bottles of flint and cut glass are chargeable with duty by the Act 7 Vict. c. 16, under the head of "Bottles of glass not otherwise enumerated or described, 1*l. per* cwt. and further, on account of the Excise duty, 7s. per cwt.;" or as "Flint and cut glass, for every 100*l.* value 30*l.* and further, on account of the Excise duty, 7s. per cwt.;" and the Customs authorities being of opinion that all bottles of flint and cut glass should be charged with the latter rate of duty, orders have been issued for the officers in London and at the outports to govern themselves accordingly.

Ecclesiastical Commission.—A supplement to the Gazette of Tuesday, published on Wednesday night, contains an Order in Council ratifying as scheme prepared by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for constituting a separate district for spiritual purposes out of the parish of Ruabon, in the county of Denbigh, which parish is of great extent, and the provision for public worship therein insufficient. The new district is to be called "The District of Rhôs Llannerchrugog," and an endowment is to be provided for the minister to be appointed. The supplement contains similar orders respecting the parishes of Bury and Whalley, in the county of Lancaster, where the new district is to be called "The District of Musbury;" respecting the parish of Monk Wearmouth, in the county of Durham, where the new district is to be called "The District of All Saints, Monkwearmouth;" respecting the parish of Kingswinford, in county of Stafford, where three new districts are to be constituted, to be called respectively "The District of Brockmoor," "The District of Quarry-bank," and "The District of Pensnett;" respecting the parish of Ecclesfield, in the county of York, where the new district is to be named "The District of Chapeltown;" respecting the parish of St. Mary-the-Virgin, in Nottingham, where the new district is to be named "The District of St. John the Baptist;" respecting the parish of St. Peter, in the city of Worcester, where the new district is to be named "The District of St. Paul;" respecting the parishes of Rowley Regis, in the county of Stafford, and St. John the Baptist, in the city of Coventry, where the new districts are to be named respectively, "The District of Reddal-hill," and "The District of St. Thomas;" and respecting the parish of Aberystwith, in the county of Monmouth, where the new district is to be named "The District of Nant-y-glo."

Registrars of the Court of Bankruptcy.—On the 11th of October next the salaries of the registrars of the Court of Bankruptcy will be increased, under the Act passed on the 9th ult. At the present period the two chief registrars have each 1,000*l.* a year, and the deputy-registrars (who are now styled "Registrars") 800*l.* and the country registrars 700*l.* It appears that there are certain fees attached to these offices, which are to be accounted for from the day mentioned, and the salaries in future to be 1,200*l.* to the two chief registrars, 1,000*l.* to each of the other registrars, and 800*l.* to those in the country districts.

The Great Will Case.—We hear that the Corporation of the city of Gloucester have arranged to abandon their suit in the case of their extensive claims on the estate of the late Mr. James Wood, of Gloucester, and that the settlement of this long-pending suit is likely to take a most unexpected turn. It is reported very confidently that the real will or codicil, properly attested, is at length forthcoming; and that a family in Worcestershire, of humble respectability, are likely, as heirs-at-law, to become possessed of Mr. Wood's enormous wealth.—Sun.

Comparative Population of Great Britain and France.—The Revue Britannique published some time back a tabular comparison of the population of France with that of Great Britain (not including Ireland), which at the present moment is not unworthy of attention. The calculations were made up from the latest census of each country respectively. Such towns only as had a population of 15,000 were inserted, the presumption being that there were few places where manufactures were carried on to any extent which have a less number of inhabitants. The results shew that in Great Britain there are 70 towns with a population of upwards of 15,000 souls, and in France only 61 towns. The comparison is not favourable to France, except when the numbers are under 30,000; but at that point stop the great seats of manufacture and commerce. The population of London is set down at 1,621,034; Manchester, 270,961; Glasgow, 202,426; Liverpool, 185,175; Edinburgh, 162,156; Birmingham, 146,986; Leeds, 123,393; Halifax, 109,899; Bristol, 103,886; Sheffield, 91,962. These ten towns belong to the first class in point of population. Taking an equal number of first-rate towns in France, the population bears no relative proportion. Paris, 874,338; Marseilles, 145,115; Lyons, 133,715; Bordeaux, 109,467; Rouen, 88,086; Nantes, 87,162; Lille, 69,073; Toulouse, 59,630; Strasburg, 49,712; Amiens, 45,001. Hence it appears that the population of these ten principal English towns amounts to 2,720,478 souls, whilst the ten principal towns of France shew a population of only 1,561,298, souls.

Battersea New Park.—The Commissioners of Woods and Forests have determined, it is said, upon purchasing Battersea-marsh and fields, a tract of land upwards of 200 acres in extent, and making a public park of the same, and which is intended to be adorned with lakes, serpentine walks, shrubberies, &c. In addition to which there will be a splendid carriage-drive along the margin of the Thames from Vauxhall to Battersea-bridge. An eminent builder has been directed to furnish the plans, and as soon as these are completed an application will be made to Parliament.

Canadian Flour and Wheat.—It appears from the statements of the exports from Canada up to the 9th of August in the past and the present year, that the quantity of flour exported had increased from about 50,000 barrels to upwards of 307,000, and the quantity of wheat from a little more than 15,000 bushels to upwards of 237,000. This has occurred in spite of unusually high freights and of a declining market in this country; and although the losses on the recent importations have fallen very heavy on the importers, the production of wheat on the banks of the St. Lawrence and the shores of the lakes is increasing so rapidly, that a constantly increasing supply must find its way to the English market. The harvest of the present year is one of the finest ever gathered in America.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

Sir,—If space will permit, and your readers are not weary of the subject, I will add a few "more last words" to what I have already sent you.

It should be borne in mind, that my primary design has been to protest against its being understood that the Legal Profession, as a body, have come to the conclusion that capital punishment is "forbidden by reason, and inconsistent with Christianity." And I have attempted to shew that the authority of the Old Testament is unquestionably with me; while the New, if it does not, in such express terms, sanction capital punishments (and how should it, when it never treats of civil government except incidentally?), yet, at least, leaves the authority of the Old Testament unweakened; and, moreover, that Christ's ministers, in evangelizing the nations, never taught that the execution of criminals was opposed to the spirit of Christianity. But Mr. Durrant replies, "It was the apostles' duty to spread the principles of Christian charity, to produce in due season a harvest of practical and universal results," and among them the abolition of capital punishment. In this I fully concur; for when Christianity has prevailed to make men live in love, capital punishment will die of itself—but not till then. The spirit of Christianity is opposed, not to punishment, but to crime; with that it proclaims eternal war. The arguments of my opponents, drawn from their notions of the spirit of Christianity, may be pointed with equal force against the infliction of the terrible sentence to be pronounced at the final judgment.

Considering, in the next place, that in appealing to the authority of Reason, the sages of antiquity might be deemed the fairest expounders of her mind, I averred that they all with one consent doomed the murderer to death. This Mr. Durrant denies; and he adduces some facts. (See his letter, p. 423.) Herodotus relates (ii. 137), from the traditions he gathered from the priests of Egypt, that in the reign of Anysis, a blind sovereign, that country was invaded by Sabacus, king of Ethiopia, who drove out Anysis, and reigned in his stead fifty years; during which period he suffered no criminal to be put to death, but employed them on works for the embellishment and defence of his cities. From the fact of his taking advantage of the circumstances of his unfortunate and less powerful neighbour, and from the act ascribed to him in chap. 152, it is at least as likely that he was influenced by views of self-aggrandisement as by tenderness for human life. We may all join with Herodotus in commending the humanity of the ancient Persians, who would not suffer a man's life to be taken away for the first offence (it is not said for the first murder or other deadly crime); but the question at issue is, whether, under any, the most aggravating circumstances, a man's life should be taken away. It is plain what would be the answer of the ancient Persians. The abolition of capital punishment in the time of the Roman republic was the consequence of their fear of kingly tyranny, under which they had groaned: its benefit extended neither to slaves nor foreigners, nor (in reality) to great offenders, as I shall presently shew. The practice of the Germans, Anglo-Saxons, and others, in allowing a fine to be paid to the kindred of the party slain, only shews their low estimate of human life. "This custom," observes Sir Matthew Hale, in his Pleas of the Crown, c. 1, "continued long, even to the time of Henry I. here in England; but shortly after grew obsolete, as too much contradictory to the Divine law." And his commentator observes on this passage, that it appears from the same laws (Wilkins's Leges Anglo-Sax. p. 267), that a malicious murder, by poison or the like, was so deadly a crime as not to admit of such a satisfaction,—"factum mortiferum nullo modo redimendum." I therefore maintain that Mr. D. has not proved me mistaken on my second point. But as he has failed to cite any case in point, I will furnish him with one, and give him all the benefit of it. The Princess Anna Comnena (the historian) had conspired against the life of her brother, the Emperor John Comnenus. "Her life," we read, "was spared, and the reproach or complaint of an injured brother was the only chastisement of the guilty princess. After this example of clemency, the remainder of his reign was never disturbed by conspiracy or rebellion: feared by his nobles, beloved by his people, John was never reduced to the painful necessity of punishing, or even of pardoning, his personal enemies. During his government of twenty-five years, the penalty of death was abolished in the Roman empire; a law of mercy most delightful to the humane theorist, but of which the practice, in a large and vicious community, is seldom consistent with the public safety." (Gibbon's Decline and Fall, &c. c. xlviii.)

Any remark of mine on Mr. Durrant's treatment of my harmless quotation from Ovid would be as idle as is his critique.

I do not see the use of his long tirade against the severity of former days, when no one attempts to justify it; nor of his collecting so many texts of scripture inculcating forgiveness, as if revenge were the operating principle of our criminal law; nor of what he says of the mode of executing, which does not affect the present question. And here I would complain of the unfair and uncourteous manner in which he imputes wrong motives to those who differ from him. Does he mean to claim to himself, and those who think with him, a monopoly of all the benevolence in the land? Is it fair to pervert my words, and then stigmatize my sentiments as "savage?"

Mr. Durrant cites some passages from Cicero, but without referring to their place in his works. In his oration for Rabirius, I find him glorying in the privileges of a freeman—that he was not obnoxious to the horrible sentence—"I LICTOR: COLLIGA MANUS: CAPUT OBNUBITO: ARBORI INFELICI SUSPENDITO;" and I could easily imagine him adding such an oratorical flourish as that cited by Mr. D. But he is here speaking as an innocent man. Does he claim the same exemption for the guilty? In this very oration he is defending Rabirius, who was charged with slaying Saturninus, a seditious tribune, who, having raised commotions in which some lives were lost, had been put into confinement with his fellows until the senate should decide their fate. Meanwhile, a party of citizens, fearing they would escape through the intrigues of Marius, broke into the senate-hall and put them to death. This act Cicero glories in, declaring that if his client had been the immediate actor, which he was not, he would have merited a reward. "Utinam fecisset! non supplicium deprecarer, sed premium postularem." It is clear that the high privilege alluded to was gloried in as a protection from the abuse of power, not as an immunity from merited punishment.

The same year furnishes a scene so much to the purpose, that I am tempted to introduce it. Cicero, who was then consul, had by his able measures frustrated the plans of Catiline, by seizing his accomplices, Lentulus, Cethegus, and others, before they could execute their diabolical project. Having summoned the senate, he bade them decide on the fate of the prisoners. Julius Cæsar cited the Porcian and Sempronian laws, which forbade the infliction of death on Roman citizens (and are so lauded by Cicero in the passage given by Mr. Durrant): wherefore he counselled that the prisoners should be imprisoned for life. Cicero was for severer measures. "If," said he, "the father of a family should spare a slave who had shed the blood of his children, who had murdered his wife, and set fire to his dwelling, how should such a father be considered?" Marcus Cato followed:—"Talk to me of mercy and pity!" said he; "of a truth, we have learned to call things by their wrong names: spare a few wretches, and let the good be their victims! In former days, Titus Manlius doomed his son to death for commencing a battle without orders; and do you hesitate what to do with these barbarous parricides?" He then glanced at what Cæsar had urged, that perpetual imprisonment was a severer punishment than death, which terminated men's sufferings, leaving them nothing to fear or hope for; and alluded (though, I admit, leaving it doubtful which way he himself inclined) to the popular belief as to the dwellings reserved for the wicked—"loca tetra, inculta, fœda, atque formidolosa"—language vividly descriptive of a state of misery, the consideration of which my opponents seem to consider as altogether a new ingredient in that which should influence the judgment of Christians in this matter. He concluded by giving it as his opinion that the prisoners should be secured by immediate death from ever again disturbing the commonwealth by their machinations. The senate decided accordingly, and the consul (Cicero) carried the sentence into speedy effect.

With respect to the positive obligation of the general precept to Noah, who stood as the representative of all mankind, and the weight which the Mosaic criminal law should have as a perfect pattern, I am happy to be able to shelter myself under the authority of Sir Matthew Hale, whose venerable name, whether as a Christian, a lawyer, or a gentleman, should check the indecent language of my opponents, who presume too much on the forbearance of your readers when they stigmatize those who differ from them, including the good and wise of all ages, as "advocates of judicial slaughter," &c. "Although," says he, "the penalties instituted by God himself among his ancient people upon the breach of their laws were with the highest wisdom fitted to that state, and all laws and instituted punishments should come up as near to that pattern as may be, yet, as to the degrees and kinds of punishments of offences in foro civili vel judiciario, they are not obliging to all other kingdoms or states; but all states, as well Christian as heathen, have varied from them." (Pleas of the Crown, c. 1.) And a little further on, "Penalties, therefore, seem to be juris positivi, et non naturalis, as to their degrees and applications; and, therefore, in different ages and states, have been set higher or lower according to the exigence of the state and wisdom of the lawgiver. Only in the case of murder there seems to be a justice of retaliation; if not ex lege naturali, yet, at least, by a general divine law given to all mankind. (Gen. ix. 6.) And although I do not deny that the supreme King of the world may remit the severity of the punishment, as he did to Cain, yea, and His substitutes, sovereign princes, may also defer or remit that punishment, or make a commutation of it on great and weighty circumstances, yet such instances should be very rare and upon great occasions."

What I have said on the subject of the Mosaic law must not be so understood as if it was a perfect model for all states to follow, without regard to the difference of their constitutions; a wider scope being given to the civil power under the Jewish polity than is usually conceded under modern constitutions. All I meant to assert was, that in pari materiâ, where their limits coincide, legislators would do well to adhere closely to the divine exemplar; though I admit, and have nowhere asserted the contrary, that it is not of positive obligation. I would here observe that the punishment for theft by the Mosaic law was not death, as Mr. Durrant seems to suppose in his second letter, but restitution and a moderate fine, except only in the case of man-stealing. And, not to trespass too much on your space, I will leave Mr. D. to enjoy his own opinions on the cause of so much of the Jewish law falling into desuetude, merely expressing my surprise at his apparent ignorance of the fact that the moral feeling becomes dulled by indulgence in sin, though undoubtedly the consciousness of guilt may remain. A severe law against adultery must become a dead letter where those who should carry it into effect are themselves habitually guilty in that respect. And I would here ask, what have I said from which it can be inferred that I admit that "the Divine Founder of Christianity approved of the accommodation of the law to changed circumstances?"

The law of Moses being the only code among the Jews expressly given for observance "throughout their generations," in all their stages of civilization, it may not be said that it was only adapted to the barbarous state consequent on their long oppression in Egypt. Were it so, it would be misleading mankind that Christians retain it as part of the sacred volume. But the truth is, that in every people, whether civilized or not, there has been, is, and will be, until the healing spirit of Christianity shall have done its work, a numerous class as debased as the bondmen in Egypt; and your correspondent, Mr. Slack, allows that "the laws of Moses, acting violently on the fears of a barbarian people, would restrain them from committing such outrages as from their moral degradation they were prone to commit," thus conceding the whole question.

The existence of such a degraded class in this country is beyond dispute, and calls loudly for the best attention of the Legislature. To erect penitentiaries and fill them with wretched beings who cannot with safety to the public be allowed their liberty, in hope of reclaiming them, while no preventive measures are adopted to save those who are treading the same downward path, is like attempting to infuse life into the withered and dying branches of a tree at the extremities, while nourishment is withheld from the root. The labour will grow on our hands, while we shall probably fail in each case; whereas a more judicious course would secure a rich harvest in return for all the labour bestowed. We all belong to the great social tree, and may not look on the suffering members as those who are merely entitled to a little pity. It is we ourselves who are suffering: it is the body that is diseased, though, as yet, it appears only in the extremities. The causes of crime are often very remote from the spot where the evil breaks out. The remedy is allowed to be a moral and religious education, which a paternal Government should place within reach of the whole community. We may also as individuals do much by taking care not to originate or transmit into the social system any thing pernicious. A man, by an act of selfishness, may be the guilty cause of theft in another, whereas an act of charity may preserve numbers from misery and crime. We have the poor always with us, and whenever we will we may do them service, and thus indirectly benefit the commonwealth. It is in this direction that I would have men's minds turned; and I have so high an opinion of the good sense of my countrymen as to believe that they will readily be led to what is practicable and reasonable, while they turn a deaf ear to theories, whose tendency is, at best, questionable, if not positively mischievous.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,
WILLIAM GILES.

[We have received several other communications on this subject, which, however, do not contain much additional argument on either side. We think also that it has already occupied so much space in our columns, that with the present letter the discussion must conclude.—ED. LAW T.]

AGREEMENT STAMPS,

Under 7 & 8 Vict. c. 21.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

SIR,—Your correspondent, "A Subscriber," inquires, what duty attaches on an agreement containing twenty-five folios? and I would simply answer 1*l*. 15*s*. assuming such agreement to be under hand only, and the matter thereof above the value of 20*l*.; but, conceiving that something more may be expected, I will shortly state the grounds on which such answer is founded.

By the 55 Geo. 3, c. 184, schedule, part 1, a duty of 1*l*. was imposed on agreements under hand, containing not more than fifteen common law folios; 1*l*. 15*s*. if more than fifteen folios; and a progressive duty of 1*l*. 5*s*. for every entire fifteen folios above the first. The recent Act of Victoria recites the expediency of reducing the duty on certain agreements, and repeals the provisions in the former Acts imposing duty on such agreements, &c. as are particularly described in the schedule thereto; and in lieu thereof imposes a duty of 2*s*. 6*d*. On reference to the schedule it will appear that an agreement, &c. whereon a duty of 1*l*. was imposed by the former Acts is the only instrument upon which the recent Act operates; and I think that any doubt your correspondent may entertain will subside on a careful perusal of the clause bearing upon the subject, and reference to the schedule annexed.

Had the Legislature intended to abolish the higher duty, the repeal of the provisions in the old Acts would have been, as affecting agreements, general and absolute; but I assume, from the careful and qualified language of the operative clause, which mentions certain agreements, &c. and refers to the schedule for a particular description, that it was intended to operate only in agreements not exceeding fifteen folios; and as the law now stands, there is nothing sufficiently strong to authorize the omission of the higher duty.

I imagine that the ambiguity of the Act is induced by the anxiety of the Profession to see the duty reduced, by which the judgment is somewhat influenced, rather than from any doubt that can arise on a fair construction of the language used, which clearly defines the instruments on which the Act is intended to operate, but appears objectionable to some practitioners, inasmuch as it possesses the usual negative quality of not enumerating the instruments which it was not intended to affect.

I shall be glad if any of your correspondents will give me reason to correct my opinion.

I am, &c.
A MANAGING CLERK.

STAMPS ON AGREEMENTS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

SIR,—It seems to me that agreements containing more than fifteen folios are still subject to the duties imposed by the 55 Geo. 3, c. 184, and are not touched by the 7 Vict. c. 21.

The preamble in the 1st section of the last-mentioned Act states that it is expedient to reduce the stamp duties, not on agreements generally, but on certain agreements; and the section goes on to repeal the duties on the agreements, &c. described in the schedule thereto annexed.

On reference to this schedule, it will be seen that the only agreement there described is that which by the 55 Geo. 3 is made "chargeable with the duty of one pound," viz. an agreement which "shall not contain more than 1,080 words."

I therefore think that all other descriptions of agreements are subject to the old duties, and consequently that "A Subscriber" should affix a 1*l*. 15*s*. stamp to his agreement of twenty-five folios.

Your most obedient servant,

Gloucester, Sept. 17, 1844. ONE, &c.

ATTORNEYS' CLERKS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

SIR,—I see by your last that "A Solicitor's Managing Clerk" wishes the question whether he can be allowed to act as an advocate to be settled. The reading of the clause in the late Act, which allows only barristers and certificated attorneys so to practise, would set the question at rest in a moment.

The station of a barrister and attorney, answerable to a summary inquiry by inns of court and by the several courts of law, and further answerable to the opinion of their fellow practitioners and to the public, gives a guarantee for honourable practice in open court, which the station of a managing clerk, not himself an attorney, does not afford. No one ever dreamed of the managing clerk of a barrister offering himself as an advocate. If clerks were allowed to practise, agents, accountants, and all that class would step in under the name of clerks.

It does unfortunately happen that, nine times out of ten, when any thing oppressive, or unfair, or ungentlemanly, has been transacted in an office, it has been by the clerk. There is a probability of an action being settled,—the clerk, anxious for his master's pocket, pushes on the proceedings at a railroad pace, and the business having been performed, of course it must be paid for. A remonstrance is made to the respectable principal: "I leave all these matters to my clerk," is his answer, and there the matter ends.

The absence or illness of a principal may allow of the violation of the rule in permitting a bonâ fide managing clerk occasionally acting for his principal, and no fair man could object to this.

September 16, 1844. A SOLICITOR.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

SIR,—Your correspondent, Mr. Lott, is, I am sorry to say, not the only solicitor who has cause to complain of the difficulty oftentimes experienced by professional men in obtaining that immediate admittance to courts of justice which they are entitled to. Barristers find no such obstructions; and why is this? because they array themselves in "wigs and gowns" when engaged in their duties.

Might not the inconvenience above referred to be in some measure obviated by attorneys having recourse to their former practice of wearing gowns when professionally engaged in the courts? Surely such would at once be a sufficient indication to the officials offering any interruption of the wearer's right to admission.

I am, Sir, your most obedient servant,

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 21, 1844.

WEEKLY HALF-HOLIDAY.

BELIEVING that the happiness and welfare of a country depend much more upon the indirect and often unheeded influences that affect the daily workings of the social system, we rejoice at the increasing signs that these influences are becoming more and more important in the eyes of our countrymen, both in Parliament and out of Parliament. As we are preeminently a business people, lovers of facts, and as questions of the nature we are now attending to cannot find a place in the strict sciences of political economy, it becomes more incumbent upon those who have had their attention turned to them to exert themselves in every way to widen the circle of active inquirers into the defects of our social system, which lurk beneath the shadow of our wealth and greatness, and are sometimes considered as necessary consequences, rather than as evils which can be combated and overcome. Among these defects, or rather among the positive vices of our present system, is to be ranked the increased amount of labour imposed upon all classes of people engaged in business. We are not blind to the causes that are commonly assigned for this; but we affirm with confidence, that thoughtlessness has been the main reason. How much was done by the Legislature to remedy an analogous evil in the factories as soon as they began really to think on the subject! Already the endeavours of the Drapers' Association to lessen the hours of attendance in their shops in the metropolis has produced much benefit. In many country towns the shops are, by agreement, closed earlier. In London—even the busiest of all the busy places—the resort of the most eager seekers after wealth, the Stock Exchange—closes an hour sooner than formerly; and we are rejoiced to see that a most praiseworthy commencement has been made in the legal Profession:—

"At a meeting of the Leeds Law Society held on Friday, 30th August, 1844, it was resolved,—'That, as an experiment for six months, it be recommended to the members of our Profession in the borough of Leeds to close their offices every Saturday at two o'clock, commencing on Saturday 7th September next; upon the distinct understanding that the clerks do not go to dinner till that hour, and that this arrangement shall in no respect excuse the attendance or duties of the clerks in cases of emergency on any Saturday in like manner as upon any other day.'"

We know that this step was the result of mature deliberation. The question was mooted some months ago. It was then thought desirable, and its practicability was alone the subject of doubt. The operation of a somewhat similar system in Manchester, Liverpool, and Newcastle was examined, and the experiment at length resolved to be made. The secretary to the society informs us that, "so far as the experiment has yet been tried, I believe its success has fully equalled, if not exceeded, the expectations of its promoters."

We sincerely hope that it will be as permanent as we are satisfied it will be useful. We congratulate the whole Profession on this recognition of the rights of the employed, and the duty of the employer. Mere money payment should not be the only bond between the two classes, but mutual consideration for each other's welfare, a mutual desire to render life more worth living for, by lessening the physical fatigue of obtaining the means of life, and increasing the means of cultivating the other powers of body and mind, without which man loses half his worth and usefulness. We trust that the example thus set will be followed throughout the kingdom. It cannot literally be followed, we well know, but the principle can be adopted everywhere. In most country towns, for instance, Saturday is the market-day, and, consequently, the busiest day, as being the only one when a great number of clients can attend without serious inconvenience to themselves. But it would not be difficult to arrange that some other day should be devoted to relaxation. In London, again, we fear that the centralization of business, and the unavoidable variation in its amount, the whole arrangement of the courts, and many other circumstances, will entirely prevent the adoption of any such plan. But the knowledge that it has been adopted in the country will lead many to think more how to compensate for this by permitting an earlier departure from the office as often as circumstances may permit. We are well aware that numbers already shew great kindness and consideration towards their clerks in this respect, and those who are at all negligent of this duty are so because they have not thought of its importance. We are expressing trite and commonplace thoughts, and referring to commonplace principles; but the greatest and most useful principles are necessarily commonplace, for they are those which should influence our every-day life. In conclusion, if it be not thought by our readers sermoni propriora—that is, as Charles Lamb has it, "properer for a sermon"—we would say, that the clerks for whose especial advantage this relaxation of labour is advocated must shew that they can appreciate the motives of their employers, by using it in such a way as to give cause to no single regret to themselves or others, that they were not, as before, kept close to the desk until the stated time had arrived.

LECTURES ON MEDICAL JURISPRUDENCE.

By ALFRED S. TAYLOR.

Delivered at Guy's Hospital, 1844.

LECTURE II.

Now, in commencing the subject of poisoning, let us first consider what is understood by the term poison. It may be said to mean a substance which, when taken internally, is capable of destroying life without acting mechanically on the system; and by this definition, you see, we exclude a variety of substances which might destroy life by a simple mechanical operation. It has been objected, that this definition does not sufficiently include animal poisons, such as that of the rattlesnake, of hydrophobia, and others of a similar kind; but as the application of this definition will rest upon the good sense of the medical jurist, the objection is, practically speaking, unimportant. The term poison has been restricted to those substances capable of destroying life when administered in small quantities, such as prussic acid and strichnia; but this is incorrect, because for many poisons to prove fatal they must be administered in large doses, and no two bodies are exactly alike in this respect. Oxalic acid is a poison, but it is doubtful whether an adult person would die from the effects of 120 grains of this substance; the smallest dose that has yet destroyed life is 240 grains, or half an ounce: that is a dose, you will see, compared with strichnia, enormously large, for half a grain of strichnia will destroy life. Yet is impossible, on account of this difference, to exclude oxalic acid from the class of poisons. Whatever may be the substance, it is not its quality, but its effects, to which a medical jurist must direct his attention. The mode of action of poisons is more interesting to the pathologist than the medical jurist. No doubt many poisonous substances, when absorbed, are carried to all parts of the body, and the chemical experiments, as they have been conducted of late years, have led to the detection of them in the blood and the secretions. Thus, arsenic and antimony have been detected in every part of the system, and many substances supposed not to be absorbed have been discovered to be so. The following table will illustrate this:—

Substances hitherto discovered in the Blood.	Secretions.	Organs.

Arsenic	Arsenic	Arsenic
Antimony	Antimony	Antimony
Copper	Lead	Copper
Lead	Nitrate of Potash	Alcohol
Iron	Iodide of Potassium
Barytes
Silver
Nitrate of Potash
Ferrocyanate of Potash
Iodine
Iodide of Potassium

Mercury has not been added to this list, because I have not met with any satisfactory instance in which it has been found in the blood, secretions, or organs of a person who has been poisoned by corrosive sublimate, or other mercurial preparations.

In what way poisons operate on the body to destroy life, it is not our business to inquire; their detection in the blood does not assist us in settling this question, nor does the tracing of them further into the body throw any light upon it. Their chemical action is manifested by sympathy or by a nervous shock, i. e. an impression on the nerves transmitted by sympathy to the brain; in some cases, directly, as in the case of prussic acid, which, when taken, kills with almost the rapidity of lightning. Here we can only describe the effects to be due to nervous sympathy—an impression produced on the extremity of the nerves of one part of the body fatally affecting the brain and nervous system in another part of the body. In most cases arsenic gives rise to violent inflammation of the stomach and intestines; but this appears insufficient to account for death in all cases, although there is no doubt that arsenic may be the cause of death, by producing local changes in the system from its irritant properties.

Habit and idiosyncrasy are terms frequently employed to explain certain states of the system. By habit we are to consider that state of the system in which a person may take with impunity a certain quantity of poison, which, if taken even in a smaller quantity in the first instance, would undoubtedly kill him; so that, as a result of habit, the effect of the poison becomes reduced, and it requires to be taken in a larger dose: this property has never been observed with respect to arsenic, corrosive sublimate, or such like mineral substances. So little does the system become accustomed to the effects of these powerful bodies even in the minutest doses in which they could be given, that a slight increase in quantity in their medicinal use has been found to produce alarming symptoms.

There is what has been called an accumulative power in poisons—a power of accumulating in the system; and by this we are to understand that condition in which a substance given in small doses produces, even without any increase of the dose, serious symptoms. This has been observed in cases of poisoning by opium, and it is a matter of great importance to know this, as many, not aware of it, may be led into the great error of supposing that the last dose only must have been the cause of death. Foxglove, or digitalis, has been found to possess this property, and death has been known to have occurred from the accumulating power of this substance when used as a medicine. I may mention an instance in which a child was thus killed by opium: four medical witnesses gave it as their opinion that opium was the cause of the death of the child, but this was denied by the party inculpated, from the fact that a dose large enough to kill the child had not been given to it at any one time. This fact is an important one to know, as it has a very extensive bearing upon the proper administration of drugs; but in most cases of criminal poisoning the dose is a large one.

Now, what is to be understood by the term idiosyncrasy? It is that peculiar condition of the system whereby a substance, not commonly called poisonous, appears to act as such. Some varieties of animal food, shell-fish and muscles, are observed to give rise to these effects in some constitutions, and it is a remarkable fact, that out of several persons partaking of the same food at the same time, some have been observed to suffer and others not to be at all affected; this has given rise to a suspicion of poisoning, but the real facts have appeared on investigation. Persons, too, may suffer from the effects of food of which at some previous time they may have partaken with perfect impunity. This has been observed with regard to pork; cases have occurred where an individual has been suddenly taken ill after having taken this kind of food, although he had eaten it previously without any injurious consequences. It has been supposed that some change has taken place in the food and not in the constitution, but on examining the food it has not been found to have undergone any change, and, moreover, it has been eaten by other persons at the same time without producing in them any particular effect: we may, therefore, conclude that the change has taken place in the individual. There is in all children, and many adult persons, a peculiar idiosyncrasy with respect to opium. A child has been killed by two drops of tincture of opium, containing one-tenth of a grain, or the one-two-hundredth of a grain of morphia.

I have had communicated to me an instance of a lady having lost her life by taking five grains of Dover's powder, containing only half a grain of opium. It may be said such cases are exceptional, and prove nothing. It is true that in ordinary practice they will not apply; but we find in medical jurisprudence exceptional cases are often of the highest importance, because they are the foundation of many very serious legal doubts. The practical question is, can we determine a priori in what constitutions this idiosyncrasy exists? And here we see much must be left to the medical practitioner, for when we find that doses considered comparatively harmless may operate fatally upon particular constitutions, it is incumbent upon us to exercise great caution in investigating cases of death among infants from the administration of Godfrey's cordial, and other quack medicines which contain a large proportion of opium. Every professional man is presumed to be well acquainted with the fact that even small doses of opium will cause the death of a child, and therefore if he administers medicines of this nature incautiously, the responsibility justly rests upon him.

It is not merely with regard to opium that this idiosyncrasy exists, but the same results have followed the use of calomel, and blue pill, and it has been observed that a fatal salivation has ensued from a quantity of mercury which had been generally taken without producing the least effect. It is necessary that witnesses should be aware of these facts, because a prisoner may rest his defence upon the fact that the quantity of poison alleged to have been administered was too small to destroy life, and that death must therefore have been owing to some other cause.

We have now to speak of the classification of poisons. For the convenience of study, the poisons of which we shall have to treat have been grouped together, or classified, and experience has shewn us that that which is the most simple is the best. The classification now generally adopted was first proposed by Orfila, and simplified by Dr. Christison. This arrangement is founded upon the effects produced by various poisons on the human system; it is not dependent upon the nature of the poison. The poisons are, therefore, not now, as formerly, arranged according to the kingdom from which they were derived—namely, the mineral, animal, and vegetable kingdoms; but they are divided into three great classes, according to their mode of action on the human system—namely, irritants, narcotics, and narcotico-irritants. The class of irritants is, for convenience, subdivided into two orders—NON-METALLICS and METALLICS; this division is of a chemical nature, and assists greatly in the analysis of poisons; with regard to narcotics and narcotico-irritants, no subdivisions are required.

In considering these classes, we will take first the irritants: they are so called because they inflame and irritate the alimentary canal, and give rise to purging and vomiting, accompanied by a burning pain in the stomach and bowels. Some irritant poisons, besides irritating and inflaming the alimentary canal, have the power of corroding, or producing a chemical destruction of the parts with which they come into contact: these are termed corrosive, and consist of the mineral acids, caustic alkalies, corrosive sublimate, nitrate of silver, and others. Their action is much impaired by dilution with water: thus nitrate of silver and corrosive sublimate lose much of their corrosive properties when diluted with water. All corrosive poisons are capable of acting as irritants, without exception; but we cannot say that purely irritant poisons act as corrosives. Among the pure irritants may be mentioned white arsenic, the salts of baryte—the carbonate and the nitrate—chloride of barium, and cantharides, which last-mentioned substance is the most striking instance of the class of irritants. They merely irritate the part with which they come into contact, and are entirely destitute of any chemical action on the organic tissues. It is customary to speak of irritants and corrosives as the same bodies, but there is a perfect distinction between them. The essential character of a corrosive poison is, that it acts chemically on all animal matter, whether living or dead, and whether it be introduced into the living stomach, or poured upon the dead body, there is the same action. This action may be controlled by life, but never entirely suspended. Oil of vitriol carbonizes equally the living and the dead stomach; the same change is effected; but in the living stomach its corrosive power is lessened by the mucus of the stomach, and its irritant action is then more manifest in the surrounding parts, but it is not readily seen unless we separate the rugæ of the stomach. The action of a corrosive is also accompanied by intense inflammation of the surrounding parts. Irritants have no chemical action on the animal tissues; they produce no physical change whatever, and do not operate chemically, but simply by exciting the living parts and producing irritation. In this respect arsenic might be regarded as an irritant, and not as a corrosive. We find, on many trials for poisoning, that witnesses are asked the question, "Is not arsenic corrosive?" the answer should be, undoubtedly, that it is not. On examining the stomachs of many persons who have been poisoned by arsenic, I have never observed any chemical action, and if parts had been removed or destroyed, this was owing to ulceration, and not to corrosion. With regard to the dead stomach, I never found any effect produced by arsenic upon it. This is the opinion of Dr. Christison, and it is admitted by all toxicologists.

It is necessary to make a distinction between the effect of irritant and corrosive poisons, to indicate the course of treatment. The symptoms of corrosive poisons come on immediately, the substances producing a chemical action on the mouth and fauces. The action of the purely irritant poisons is more slowly manifested; the symptoms do not often happen for half an hour. We may, therefore, by attending to this point, distinguish in a case of poisoning between arsenic and corrosive sublimate, and the circumstance to be noticed is, that as the action of corrosives is of a chemical nature, an examination of the mouth and fauces will enable us to tell whether such a poison has been swallowed or not. In that way we can detect poisoning by the mineral acids.

With regard to the second class, the narcotic poisons, they act on the brain and the nervous system, producing cephalalgia, vertigo, paralysis, coma, and sometimes tetanus. They have no action on the alimentary canal, and do not produce either vomiting or purging, neither do they irritate or inflame the abdominal viscera. One apparent exception to this remark exists in the case of tincture of laudanum, or opium, but we must remember that it is probably the alcohol which irritates, and not the opium. There is a case recorded by Dr. Hodgkin in which the symptoms resembled poisoning by prussic acid; the particulars of the case are not well known; there was a great redness of the stomach, which is not a common effect of prussic acid, and it may have happened here that some other substance, such as brandy, was taken at the time. It is proper to observe that some irritants produce effects similar to those produced by some narcotics, causing stupor, coma, and convulsions. These symptoms have been witnessed in cases of poisoning by oxalic acid. The pure narcotic poisons belong entirely to the vegetable kingdom, and are very few in number.

The third class, narcotico-irritants, derive their name from the circumstance of their having a compound action, producing effects of a mixed kind. They irritate and inflame the alimentary canal, and act on the brain and nervous system like narcotics. They all belong to the vegetable kingdom, and among them may be mentioned strychnia, brucia, conium, and nux vomica. Strychnia is a most energetic poison. The effects of these poisons are manifested on the spinal marrow, producing something like tetanus, with convulsions. In poisoning by nux vomica persons retain their senses to the last moment of life; the body being drawn up and rigid; the muscles of the chest and thorax in a state of spasmodic fixture. The fact that the senses are retained to the last shews that the influence of the poison is not on the brain.

One of the greatest difficulties a medical practitioner has to encounter in conducting a case of poisoning is to know what points to observe, because, at the trial which subsequently takes place, questions are directed by the counsel to points which the witness may have overlooked or considered trivial and unimportant. In a case of poisoning, we must remember that our object is not only to save the life of the individual, but also, in the event of a crime having been perpetrated, to give such clear and indisputable evidence as will throw the guilt upon the perpetrator. The rules derived from the examination of a large number of cases of criminal poisoning, which are necessary to be observed by a medical jurist in all cases of suspected poisoning are, first, with respect to the SYMPTOMS: 1st. The time of their occurrence, and their nature. 2nd. The exact period at which they were observed to take place after a meal, or after food or medicine had been taken. 3rd. The order of their occurrence. 4th. Whether there had been any remission or intermission, or continual aggravation until death. 5th. Whether the individual had laboured under any previous illness. 6th. Whether the symptoms were observed to recur more violently after taking particular meats or particular kinds of food. 7th. Whether the patient has vomited; the vomited matters, if any (especially those first ejected), to be procured; their colour noted, and their quantity, odour, and other properties. With regard to the quantity, this is really important, because it assists in determining at any future time the effect of a certain quantity of poison. 8th. Suppose none are to be procured, and the vomiting has taken place on the dress, furniture, or floor of the room, then cut off a portion of the clothing, sheet, or carpet, and reserve it for analysis; if the vomiting has taken place on a deal floor, a portion of the wood should be scraped or cut out. In a case of a female who had been poisoned by sulphuric acid, there was not the slightest trace of poison found in the stomach; but upon a careful examination of the bed and the various parts stained, and by distillation. the most complete evidence was produced, which bore out the inference previously formed. In another case of an animal poisoned by arsenic, no poison was found in the stomach, but a portion of the deal floor on which the animal was found was procured. This was tested, and the arsenic discovered in it. 9th. We should endeavour to ascertain the probable nature of the food or medicine last taken. 10th. Ascertain the nature of all the different articles of food used at the meal. 11th. Any suspected articles of food, as well as the vomited matters, should be sealed up in a proper vessel and reserved for analysis. 12th. Note down in their own words all explanations voluntarily made by parties present, or who are supposed to be interested in the suspected poisoning. 13th. Ascertain whether more than one person partook of the food or the medicine; and if so, whether more than one person was affected, and how. 14th. Whether the same kind of food or medicine had been taken by the patient before with impunity. 15th. Suppose the person dies, then it will be necessary to ascertain the exact time of death, and thus to determine how long a period the person has survived after the first seizure. This affords an important means of judging of the nature of the poison taken, because poison kills at various periods. 16th. You should observe the attitude and position of the body. 17th. The state of the dress. 18th. All surrounding objects, such as bottles, paper packets, weapons, or spilled liquids lying about. 19th. Observe whether the vomiting (if any) has taken place when the individual was lying down or standing up; or whether it has occurred in a sitting posture. If the person have vomited in the erect or sitting posture, the front of the dress will commonly be found covered with the vomited matter; but if the person be lying down, the vomited matter will be merely about the mouth and neck, and not reaching down the person. That is a sort of loose criterion, but it may lead to important inferences. 20th. With regard to the post mortem appearances—note the external appearance of the body, whether the surface be livid or pallid. 21st. Also the state of the countenance. 22nd. Note the presence or absence of all marks of violence on the body, and of all marks of blood. 23rd. Observe the presence or absence of warmth or coldness in the legs, arms, abdomen, mouth, or axillæ. 24th. The presence of rigidity or cadaverous spasm in the body. Rigidity only occurs when the body is cold, and spasm may occur in the act of dying, and remain after death. We read of cases of suicide in which persons have been found grasping a razor firmly in the hand, the body being warm. This is not cadaverous rigidity, it is the persistance in the muscles after death of that state of spasmodic contraction produced in the last act by which they were exercised whilst living. 25th. If the body is found dead, we should endeavour to ascertain when the deceased was last seen alive, or known to have been alive. 26th. Notice, too, all circumstances which lead to suspicion of suicide or murder.

On inspection of the body, the first thing to attend to is the state of the abdominal viscera. 2nd. If the stomach and intestines be found inflamed, the seat of the inflammation should be exactly specified, and all marks of ulceration, effusion of blood, corrosion, or perforation. 3rd. The contents of the stomach should be collected in a clean vessel, the quality noted, and their colour, odour, and nature specified. 4th. The contents of the duodenum should be separately collected. 5th. Observe the state of the large intestines, especially the rectum, which is very often inflamed when other parts of the bowels are not. 6th. Then again, in these post mortem examinations, it is important to notice the state of the larynx, fauces, and œsophagus, whether there be in these parts any corrosion or inflammation. All corrosives act on this part of the body, whereas irritants, if we except cantharides, act only on the stomach. 7th. The state of the thoracic viscera and all morbid changes should be noted. 8th. The state of the brain should be carefully noticed.

With regard to cases of supposed poisoning, as, for instance, by arsenic, the blood should be collected from the vena cava and the heart, though, from my own observation, I have detected arsenic in the liver when it could not be detected in the blood.

Now, in pursuing our investigations with regard to poisoning, the next point for the medical jurist to inquire into is, what is the evidence of poisoning in the living body? This inquiry becomes necessary in every case—under all charges of administering poison with intent to murder, but from the effects of which the patient ultimately recovers. A knowledge of the symptoms in the living subject is also necessary where the person dies, because the evidence that may be obtained from post mortem appearance is most conclusive. At present, however, we will suppose the case to have been that poison has been taken, and the patient survives.

Some Toxicologists have laid down certain characters by which it is supposed symptoms of poisoning in the living body may be distinguished from those caused by disease. 1stly. Symptoms of poisoning appear suddenly when the individual is in good health. It is the common character of most poisons to produce serious symptoms immediately after they are taken, or within a very short time: Their action cannot be suspended, and then manifests itself after an indefinite period, although in the old works on Toxicology there are what are called slow poisons, which were supposed to be universally employed in the Middle Ages, under circumstances of great mystery; a dose being administered to an individual, which it was supposed would produce its effect a month, or at any other period, after it was taken. It is true the effects of a poison may be retarded, and then come on at a certain period, when the individual gradually languishes and dies; but to say that a person may take a dose of poison which is to produce no effect until a certain fixed period, and then it is to burst out and produce fatal results, is quite untrue. There is one apparent objection to this view in the case of accumulative poisons, which, in small divided doses, produce scarcely any perceptible effect on the system, but the individual dies from the accumulative power which these doses produce. Here the poison is frequently repeated, and this kind of poisoning is very rarely witnessed in criminal cases. There have been one or two such cases, but they have been more the result of accident. Where poison is taken, it is almost always in such doses as to cause the symptoms to appear suddenly, and to run through their course with great rapidity. In cases of poisoning by prussic acid, oxalic acid, or strychnia, the symptoms appear immediately, or within a very few minutes after the poison is swallowed; while those from arsenic and other irritant poisons, and, indeed, from all poisons generally, are manifested in from half an hour to an hour after the poison has been swallowed; they are very rarely protracted beyond an hour. It is said that some narcotico-irritant poisons, such as the poisonous mushrooms, may remain in the stomach twelve, fourteen, or sixteen hours before they produce their effects. This may be so; we do not know of there having been any narcotic poisons whose effects are so retarded; but doubtless there may occur some exceptions. This accumulative power does not exist in all poisons.

The following case occurred in 1835:—A woman aged sixty-five accused her husband, an old man of seventy, of having attempted to poison her. The woman was passionate, ill-tempered, eccentric in her habits, and subject to occasional attacks of hysteria. She handed to the authorities a vessel containing arsenic in coarse powder, and some food which she stated had been prepared for her by the prisoner. On analysis, the food was found to contain a large quantity of arsenic. The husband was immediately committed to prison. The wife left her bed, and was apparently quite well; and so she remained for eight days afterwards, no symptoms of poisoning having manifested themselves about her. She was then seized with a fit of mania, and was guilty of many extravagant acts. She died the following day; that is, nine days after she had accused her husband of having administered arsenic to her in her food. On a post mortem examination it was evident she had died from the effects of arsenic. The poison was found in large quantity in the alimentary canal, and there were the usual morbid changes in the stomach and intestines. The husband denied that he had administered poison to the deceased; and stated that his interest lay in preserving her life, because the property which they possessed would go to her representatives on her death. This denial would have availed him but little, had it not been for the careful medico-legal investigation of the whole case made by the medical witnesses. As the husband had been confined in prison eight days before the death of his wife, he could not have committed the crime imputed to him, unless he had administered the arsenic previous to his imprisonment. His guilt, under these circumstances, rested upon the testimony of the medical witnesses; and it became important, in order to bring the charge home to the husband, to decide whether this quantity could have been introduced into the body before the arrest of the husband. The two medical witnesses, well acquainted with the subject of poisoning, answered the question decidedly in the negative, and the husband was set at liberty. On considering this subject, we cannot but agree with the decision of the medical witnesses; for from the time of the accusation no symptoms of poisoning by arsenic manifested themselves in the deceased until a period of eight days, during the whole of which time the husband was in prison.

Now the question is this—Could so much of this violent poison have remained dormant in the stomach for so long a period, without exciting any symptoms? So far as experience is concerned, the answer must be in the negative; it cannot remain dormant in the body, and then begin to manifest its effects only after the long period of eight days. It may be said, that the husband intended poisoning the wife, and that there might have been some symptoms at the time, though her death took place subsequently. True, but there is no proof of that in the evidence. The deceased appears at the time to have been bordering on insanity; and these suppositions should be received with distrust. The only substantial proof was the discovery of arsenic in the house; but there is no doubt she placed the poison in the food, because she was able to point out the vessel which had been used for the poison. The supposition of the husband having administered any poison was contradicted by there having been no symptoms manifested whilst he was with her, and by their having appeared while he was so placed, that it was utterly impossible that he could have administered it. It was therefore fortunate for him that he was confined.

There was another singular case, that of the Crown Prince of Sweden, which occurred at Stockholm in 1812. The prince was supposed by many to have been killed by poison. It appears that he was reviewing some troops, when he was observed to fall suddenly from his horse, and was picked up dead by his attendants. It was said that he was poisoned by one of the court physicians, Dr. Rossi, and the popular prejudice was so strong that poison had been administered to the prince, that this physician was obliged to escape from the country. It is obvious, however, from an examination of the particulars of the case, that had this sudden attack been due to poison, it could only have been from one of the most active narcotics, given to him but a short time before he fell from his horse. But it was ascertained that the prince had taken neither solid nor liquid of any kind for at least four hours previously to his death. The allegation of poisoning was thus disproved, for no poison operating with symptoms like those under which the prince had died could have had its effects suspended for four hours. The cause of death was apoplexy. In such a case as this, the question would be, "Is there any poison that can destroy a man's life in an instant, that can be taken in the body, and remain four hours, without producing any effect whatever?" And the answer is decidedly in the negative.

The Practice of the Crown Office of the Court of Queen's Bench, with Forms of all the Pleadings, Rules, Notices, &c., which occur in Practice. By JOHN FREDERICK ARCHBOLD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law. London, 1844. Owen Richards.

IT has often been remarked that changes in the principles or administration of the law, however desirable and beneficial in themselves, necessarily entail a great increase of labour upon the members of the Profession. The 6 & 7 Vict. c. 20, by which the practice in the Crown side of the Queen's Bench was thrown open, is a strong instance of this. Hitherto little was known on this subject, because as long as the whole business was transacted by the clerks in court, little knowledge was needed by the practising attorney, while barristers were compelled to learn the details solely by experience, and continued attendance in the courts. But now, when this practice is thrown open to all the Profession, every attorney—at least every London attorney—is bound to make himself acquainted with it, or to possess the means of knowledge within his reach. To assist him in this otherwise almost hopeless task, the indefatigable Mr. ARCHBOLD has added another text-book to that valuable list for which the Profession are so much indebted to him. In preparing this handbook to a new and difficult department of legal knowledge, he has not only displayed his usual industry and care in collecting the reported authorities for the guidance of the practitioner, but he has, as he tells us in his preface, been afforded every information and assistance that he could possibly desire by the officers of the Crown-office, to whose unwearied readiness he modestly says "he will be indebted for any character for accuracy which the work may hereafter acquire." That it will acquire a high character for accuracy is guaranteed by this very circumstance, in conjunction with the known ability of Mr. Archbold to present in a clear and practical form the knowledge that he seeks to impart to his readers.

He arranges the work into its three natural divisions:—1. The original proceedings on the Crown side of the court; namely, indictments originally preferred here; criminal informations, filed either by the Queen's Coroner and Attorney, or by the Attorney-General ex officio; and informations in the nature of quo warranto. 2. Proceedings in the court, as a court of supervision or appeal; namely, by certiorari, writ of error, and mandamus. 3. Collateral proceedings; namely, articles of the peace, attachment, and habeas corpus.

After treating generally of indictments and criminal informations, he then treats of the process upon these indictments and informations, outlawry, bail, the appearance and plea, replication, &c. demurrer, suggestions for trial in another county, proceedings to compel the defendant to go to trial, costs of the day for not proceeding to trial; the notice of trial, Nisi Prius record, jury process, and all the other proceedings to and at the trial; the postea, new trial, arrest of judgment, costs; the judgment and execution. In treating of the information in nature of a quo warranto, after stating at considerable length in what cases it lies, within what time to be brought, and upon whose application granted, he proceeds to treat of the motion and rule for it; the information itself; process upon it; the appearance; the pleadings, notice of trial; Nisi Prius record, and other proceedings to trial; postea, costs, judgment, and execution.

Under the second division he commences with the writ of certiorari for the removal of indictments and the proceedings thereon to judgment and execution; he then treats of the certiorari to remove coroners' inquisitions, and then of the certiorari to remove convictions, orders in and out of sessions, and in other cases.

From this division we select the section on coroners' inquisitions as in no other legal forms are to be found such frequent defects.(a)

"Certiorari to remove Coroners' Inquisitions.

"In what cases, generally.—A certiorari is granted to remove an inquisition taken before a coroner, into the Court of Queen's Bench, either for the purpose of quashing it, or of putting it into a course of trial. An application for the latter purpose very seldom occurs in practice; but when it does, the process and other proceeding are the same as upon the removal of an indictment for the same offence, and therefore it is unnecessary to consider that part of the subject further. Where the intention is to quash the inquisition, the application is usually made at the instance of some person upon whose property a deodand has been laid by the inquest, and who seeks to quash the inquisition for defects appearing upon the face of it, in order to get rid of the deodand; or by the family of the deceased, where the inquest have found him felo de se, in order to get rid of the forfeiture.

"An inquisition may be quashed, either for a want of jurisdiction in the coroner or person taking it, or for some defect appearing upon the face of it.

"In the first place, as to the want of jurisdiction:—If a coroner take an inquisition upon a body, which at the time is lying at a place which is not within his jurisdiction, the inquisition is bad, and may be quashed. (St. 4 Ed. 1, De Officio Coronatoris. Anon. MS. E. 1844.) By stat. 6 & 7 Vict. c. 12, s. 1, after reciting that it often happens that it is unknown where persons lying dead have come by their deaths, and also that such persons may die in other places than those in which the cause of death happened: it is enacted, that the coroner only within whose jurisdiction the body of any person, upon whose death an inquest ought to be holden, shall be lying dead, shall hold the inquest, notwithstanding that the cause of death did not arise within the jurisdiction of such coroner; and in the case of any body found dead in the sea, or any creek, river, or navigable canal within the flowing of the sea, where there shall be no deputy-coroner for the jurisdiction of the Admiralty of England, the inquest shall be holden only by the coroner having jurisdiction in the place where the body shall be first brought to land. And by sec. 2, for the purpose of holding coroners' inquests, every detached part of a county, riding, or division shall be deemed to be within that county, riding, or division by which it is wholly surrounded, or where it is partly surrounded by two or more counties, ridings, or divisions, within that one with which it has the longest common boundary. (See R. v. Great Western Railway Company, 3 Ad. & El. N. C. 333.)

"Formerly a coroner, being a judicial as well as ministerial officer, could not appoint a deputy (R. v. Farrand, 3 B. & A. 260) unless expressly empowered to do so by some Act of Parliament or charter. But now, by stat. 6 & 7 Vict. c. 83, every coroner may appoint a deputy, subject to the approval of the Lord Chancellor, a duplicate of the appointment being sent to the clerk of the peace to be filed among the records of the sessions; and every inquest taken before such deputy, and all other acts done by him as such, shall be deemed to be the acts of the coroner.

"Secondly.—As to defects upon the face of it: Formerly a coroner's inquest was liable to be quashed for a great number of defects, having no reference whatever to the merits. But now, by stat. 6 & 7 Vict. c. 83, s. 2, 'no inquisition found upon or by any coroner's inquest, nor any judgment recorded upon or by virtue of any such inquisition, shall be quashed, stayed, or reversed for want of the averment therein of any matter unnecessary to be proved, nor for the omission of the words "with force and arms," or of the words "against the peace," or of the words "against the form of the statute,"—nor for the omission or insertion of any other words or expressions of mere form or surplusage,—nor for the insertion of the words "upon their oath," instead of the words "upon their oaths,"—nor for omitting to state the time at which the offence was committed, when time is not the essence of the offence,—not for stating the time imperfectly—nor because any person or persons mentioned in any such inquisition is or are designated by a name of office or other descriptive appellation, instead of his, her, or their proper name or names—nor by reason of the non-insertion of the names of the jurors in the body of any such inquisition, or of any difference in the spelling of the names of any of the jurors in the body of any such inquisition and the names subscribed thereto—nor because any juror or jurors shall have set his or their mark or marks to any such inquisition, instead of subscribing his or their name or names thereto; nor because any such mark or marks is or are unattested, provided the name or names of such juror or jurors is or are set forth—nor because any juror or jurors has or have signed his or their Christian name or names by means of an initial or initials only, and not at full length—nor because of any erasures or interlineations appearing in any such inquisition, unless the same shall be proved to have been made after the same was signed—nor for want of a proper venue, where the inquest shall appear or purport to have been taken by a coroner of the county, riding, city, borough, liberty, division, or place in which it shall appear or purport to have been taken—nor (except only in cases of murder or manslaughter) for or by reason of any such inquisition not being duly sealed or written upon parchment—nor by reason of any such inquisition having been taken before any deputy instead of the coroner himself—nor because the coroner and jury did not all view the body at one and the same instant, provided they all viewed the body at the first sitting of the inquest. And in all or any of such cases of technical defect, as are hereinbefore mentioned, it shall be lawful for any judge of either of her Majesty's courts at Westminster, or any judge of assize or gaol delivery, if he shall so think fit, upon the occasion of any such inquisition being called in question before him, to order the same to be amended in any of the respects aforesaid, and the same shall forthwith be amended accordingly.'

"But still, an inquest, to be good, must be signed by the jury as well as the coroner (R. v. JJ. of Norfolk, 1 East, 383); and it is usual for them to seal it also. (Id.) So, if it do not disclose the place where the body at the time was lying dead, inasmuch as it does not in that case shew that the coroner has jurisdiction, it is bad, and may be quashed. (Vide ante.) And therefore where the coroner's inquisition omitted to state the place where the death happened or where the body was found, the Court held this to be a defect in substance and not amendable, and they therefore quashed the inquisition. (R. v. Evett, 6 B. & C. 247.) So, where the inquisition stated the facts of the case, and the verdict found appeared not to be warranted by the facts, the Court quashed it. (Re Cully, 5 B. & Ad. 230.)

"So, if an inquisition find a deodand, and it be bad as to that, it may be quashed as to the deodand, and stand good as to the residue of it. And therefore where an inquisition upon the body of J. S. who was killed by a steam-boat running down the ship in which he was, found a verdict of manslaughter against the captain of the steam-boat, and also found that the steam-boat was moving to the death, &c. the Court quashed the inquisition as far as respected the deodand, holding that there could be no deodand in a case of felony. (R. v. Polwart, 1 Ad. & El. N. C. 818.) If a man fall from the wheel of a cart and be killed—if the cart were standing still at the time, the wheel alone shall be a deodand; but if the cart were then in motion, the whole cart and the horses drawing the same shall be forfeited. (1 Hawk. c. 26, s. 3.) And the like in other cases. And if in such a case the jury were to find the whole cart to be a deodand, when they ought to have found the wheel only, or the like, the Court would quash the inquisition as far as respected the deodand. (See R. v. Brownlow et al., 11 Ad. & El. 118; R. v. Grand Junction Railway Company, Id. 128, n.) So if the thing found to be a deodand be not stated to be the property of some person by name, the inquisition will be bad, and may be quashed. Even where the inquisition stated that a certain steam-engine and railway carriages moving to the death were 'the goods and chattels of and in the possession of the proprietors of the Hull and Selby Railway and of the proprietors of the Leeds and Selby Railway,' the inquisition was quashed, because it did not appear that there were any corporation of those names. (R. v. West, 1 Ad. & El. N.C. 826.)

"The motion, &c.—The application for the certiorari is made to the Court in term time, or to a judge in vacation, a copy of the inquisition being annexed to the affidavits, or some defect in it expressly sworn to (R. v. Manchester and Leeds Railway Company, 3 Nev. & P. 439); and in practice it is usually an ex parte application, and the rule or order absolute in the first instance, as in the case of a certiorari to remove an indictment, unless the Court or judge otherwise order. Upon obtaining the rule or fiat, engross the writ upon parchment, indorse upon it, 'By rule of court,' or 'By fiat of Mr. Justice ——,' with the name and address of the attorney suing it out; get it signed, sealed, and entered at the Crown-office; pay 5s., and then deliver it to the coroner. The writ is tested on the day it issues, and if issued in Term must be made returnable immediately before the Queen at Westminster, or if issued in vacation, shall be made returnable immediately before a judge at chambers, or on a day certain in the ensuing Term before the Queen at Westminster, unless otherwise ordered. (Reg. 3.)"

The practice as to the delivery of a certiorari to remove convictions and orders, and the return thereto, he thus lays down:—

"Delivery of the writ, and return.—The writ, with the recognizance annexed, is delivered to the justices, or one of them, to whom it is directed, or to the clerk of the peace, if it be directed to the sessions; and it is returned accordingly. The return must be upon parchment, otherwise the Court, upon application, will quash it. If the certiorari be to remove a conviction or order made by magistrates out of sessions, and of course directed to them individually, the return must be made by them. And in the latter case, if the magistrates have already transmitted the conviction to the sessions, he may state that fact in his return, and certify a copy of it. (R. v. Eaton, 2 T. R. 285.) A conviction may be returned by a magistrate in a more formal shape than that in which it was first drawn (R. v. Baker, 1 East, 186); an order cannot. (R. v. JJ. of Cheshire, 5 B. & Adolph. 439.) Care must be taken, however, to return only the conviction or order; where a certiorari issued to remove an order of sessions made upon an appeal against an order of removal, and the sessions returned not only their order, but also the order of removal, examination, and notice of chargeability, the Court held that it was irregular to return more than the order of sessions, and that the return therefore ought to be quashed. (R. v. Abergele, 8 Ad. & El. 394.)

"Motion to quash, &c.—In the case of an order, either of sessions, or of justices out of sessions, you first move for a rule nisi to quash it; and if it be an order subject to a case, the motion is a hand motion, requiring merely counsel's signature. Take this to the Crown-office, and the rule will thereupon be put into the Crown paper for argument. (Reg. 21.)

"But in the case of a conviction, as soon as it is returned upon the certiorari and filed, either party may obtain from the Crown-office a rule for a concilium, and serve it, which rule shall specify the day on which the case will be put in the Crown paper for argument, and shall be drawn up and served six days at least before such day within forty miles of London, and eight days in all other cases. (Reg. 21.)

"And in both cases paper books must be made up and delivered to the judges two days before the case is to be put in the paper (Reg. 22), in the same manner precisely as upon a demurrer; except that where the order has been made subject to a special case, it is not necessary to state the points to be argued, in the margin of the paper book.

"The case is afterwards argued, first by all the counsel for the party who has to support the conviction or order, and next by all the counsel for the party who seeks to quash it. The Court then pronounce their judgment. It may be necessary to mention that the defendant may make use of any affidavits sworn after the service of the notice on the justices, though previously to obtaining the certiorari (12 Ad. & El. 131, n.) if the rule nisi have been drawn up on reading them.

"If the sessions upon appeal quash or confirm an order of justices, and both orders are brought before the Court of Queen's Bench by certiorari; there, if the order of justices be bad upon the face of it, and the order of sessions confirm it, the Court will quash both orders; if the order of sessions quash it, the Court will intend that it was quashed for defect of form, and will confirm the order of sessions; but if the order of justices be good upon the face of it, then if the sessions confirm it, the Court of course will confirm the order of sessions; or, if the sessions quash it, the Court will intend that it was quashed upon the merits, and confirm the order of sessions. (South Cadbury v. Bradden, 2 Salk. 607; Set. & Rem. 172; 2 Arch. P. L. pl. 214.)

"Procedendo.—If the certiorari have been obtained in a case where it ought not to have been granted, as if it have issued in a case in which certiorari will not lie, or be sued out by a party who had no right to do so, or if there have not been a sufficient notice to the justices, the Court upon application will award a procedendo, if such application be made within a reasonable time.

"Or if upon argument the conviction or order be confirmed, and it be necessary, for the purpose of enforcing it, that it should be sent back to the justices who made it, the Court upon application, or a judge at chambers by order, will award a procedendo. (R. v. Neville, 2 B. & Ad. 299.) But where a fine or sum of money is ordered to be paid by the conviction or order, the Court of Queen's Bench may enforce the payment by a levari facias.

"The procedendo is tested on the day of issue. The levari is tested on the day on which it issues, and is made returnable either immediately or on a day certain in Term; and the place of abode and addition of the party against whom it is issued must be indorsed upon it. (Reg. 10.)"

The writ of error is then briefly but satisfactorily treated of, and an elaborate view of the law of mandamus, and the various cases in which it lies (pp. 204—274). The following extract gives the result of numerous recent cases with reference to railroads:—

"To railway companies.—The several Acts of Parliament for making railways usually contain provisions for awarding compensation to the owners and occupiers of property taken for the purposes of the works, or affected or injured thereby. The provision usually made is, by requiring the proprietors of the railway, upon request of the owner or occupier of the property, to issue their precept to the sheriff of the county, to summon an inquest or jury to assess the compensation that such owner or occupier ought to receive for the property taken or injury done. And if this, when demanded, be refused, the Court, at the instance of the party grieved, will award a mandamus to the company, commanding them to issue their precept to the sheriff, and to proceed to have the value or damage assessed. (See R. v. Eastern Counties Railway Company, 2 Ad. & El. N. C. 347; R. v. London and Greenwich Railway Company, 3 Id. 166; R. v. Northern Union Railway Company, 9 Law J. 53, Q.B.) But where a railway company took possession of a man's land in March, 1839, constructed their works upon it, and thereby injured his adjoining property; and in April, 1841, the party applied for a mandamus to compel the company to summon a jury to assess compensation, as well for the land taken as for the injury done: but as it appeared that the company were proceeding with other works which would be a further injury to the party's land, and bonâ fide assigned that as a reason for refusing to issue the precept, Coleridge, J. refused the writ. (Ex parte Parkes, 10 Law J. 359, Q.B.; 9 Dowl. 614.) And where a railway Act directed that in certain cases the company should issue their precept to the sheriff to summon a jury to assess damages, and that the verdict and judgment thereon should be final and conclusive, the Court, after a judgment had been entered up under the Act, refused to grant a mandamus requiring the company to issue another precept, although the under-sheriff had excluded from the jury one ground of damages, and the jury had also found a verdict against evidence. (R. v. Eastern Counties Railway Company, 12 Law J. 271, Q.B.)

"In other respects also, if a railway company will not comply with the provisions of the Act of Parliament by which they are created or regulated, the Court will in general compel them to do so by mandamus. And therefore where a railway company, by their Act, undertook to make a certain line of railroad, and it appeared that they had completed a part, were about to make another part, but that it was their intention to abandon the remainder, the Court awarded a mandamus to compel them to proceed to make and complete the whole line of way. (R. v. Eastern Counties Railway Company, 10 Ad. & El. 531.) So, where a railway was made under the authority of an Act of Parliament, by which the proprietors were incorporated, and by which it was provided that the public should have the beneficial enjoyment of the same, and the company, after making the railway, afterwards took up the rails and discontinued the way, it was holden that a mandamus would lie to compel the company to reinstate the railway, and lay the rails down again. (R. v. Severn and Wye Railway Company, 2 B. & A. 646.)

"The Court have awarded a mandamus, commanding a railway company to make an arch of a certain height, by which they carried their railway over a street, according to the provisions of their Act (R. v. Eastern Counties Railway, 2 Ad. & El. N. C. 569); and to make the approaches to a bridge, which they built, of the width required by their Act. (R. v. Birmingham and Gloucester Railway Company, 2 Ad. & El. N. C. 47.)

"But the Court have refused a mandamus to compel a railway company to alter a viaduct which they had built over a turnpike-road, so as to make it conformable with the provisions of the Act, the prosecutors not having demanded that they should make it in the particular way now required, although from time to time, in the progress of the work, they expressed their disapprobation of the manner in which the company were doing it. (R. v. Bristol and Exeter Railway Company, 12 Law J. 106, Q. B.) Also, the Court have refused a mandamus to compel a railway company to convey along their line the goods of a certain carrier, there being no clause in their Act requiring them to carry all goods offered to them for conveyance; and this, although the company had agreed with certain other carriers to convey their goods exclusively; if the applicant had any right, he had his remedy by action. (Ex parte Robins, 7 Dowl. 566.) So, where in an action brought against a railway company, in the name of their treasurer, the plaintiff obtained a verdict, but entered up his judgment, not against the treasurer, but the company, the Court refused a mandamus commanding the company to pay the amount of the judgment; for, as the plaintiff had entered up his judgment against the company, he might have his remedy by a writ of execution. (R. v. Victoria Park Company, 1 Ad. & El. N. C. 288.)"

After pointing out what the return must be, and what it must not be, and the mode of demurring to it under 6 & 7 Vict. c. 67, he gives the practice as to pleading to it thus—

"In what cases.—Formerly, if the return were good upon the face of it, but false in fact, the prosecutor had no means of traversing it, and no remedy at all, except by bringing an action on the case against the defendants for their false return (Rich v. Pilkington, Carth. 171; R. v. Mayor of Rippon, 1 Ld. Raym. 564; Green v. Pope, Id. 125; Bul. N. P. 202); but if he succeeded in obtaining a verdict and judgment in that action, the Court then awarded a peremptory mandamus. (Buckley v. Palmer, 2 Salk. 430.)

"But by stat. 9 Anne, c. 20, s. 2 (which related only to the offices of 'mayors, bailiffs, portreeves, and other officers within cities, towns corporate, boroughs, and places' within England and Wales, but has since been extended to writs of mandamus in all cases by stat. 1 Wm. 4, c. 21, s. 3), it is enacted that where a return shall be made to a writ of mandamus, 'it shall and may be lawful to and for the person or persons suing or prosecuting such writ, to plead to or traverse all or any of the material facts contained within the said return; to which the person or persons making such return shall reply, take issue, or demur; and such further proceedings, and in such manner, shall be had therein, for the determination thereof, as might have been had if the person or persons suing such writ had brought his or their action on the case for a false return.'

"The words of the statute being 'plead to or traverse,' the prosecutor may either traverse the return, or confess and avoid it by a special plea; or he may traverse a part, and plead specially to the residue. He may traverse any one or more of the material allegations in the return; and if he traverse a part only, yet if the residue of the allegations, which are unanswered, constitute of themselves no valid return, the prosecutor, if he succeed in his traverse, will be entitled to judgment, and to an award of a peremptory mandamus. (R. v. Trustees of Luton Turnpike Road, 1 Ad & El. N. C. 860.) On the other hand, if the allegations which he traverses be immaterial, the defendants may demur to his pleas; or, even if he succeed in obtaining a verdict upon them, the defendants will be entitled to judgment non obstante veredicto. (R. v. Governor of Darlington Grammar School, 12 Law J. 124, Q.B.) Or, the prosecutor, instead of traversing the return, may confess and avoid it by a special plea (see R. v. Overseers of Todmorden and Walsden, 1 Ad. & El. N. C 185; R. v. Churchwardens of Brancaster, 7 Ad. & El. 458); for although the above statute of Anne extended only to cases where an action would lie for a false return, yet the stat. 1 Wm. 4, c. 21, s. 3, by extending it to all cases of mandamus, has had the effect of making it applicable as well to cases where an action for a false return would not lie at common law. (R. v. Fall et al. 1 Ad. & El. N. C. 647, 636.) Or, the prosecutor may traverse a part of the return, and also plead specially to the residue (see R. v. Churchwardens of Brancaster, supra); or, he may traverse a part or the whole, and also plead specially to it. (See R. v. Governors of Darlington Grammar School, supra.)

"But if the prosecutor have demurred to the return, and the return be adjudged good, he will not be allowed afterwards to plead to or traverse it. (R. v. Mayor of London, 3 B. & Ad. 255; see R. v. Payn, 11 Ad. & El. 955.) But where a return contains several distinct heads of answer, the prosecutor, by leave of the Court, may traverse one or more of these, after having argued the validity of the others in point of law. (R. v. North Midland Railway Company, 11 Ad. & El. 995, n.)

"How.—The plea, if special, must be signed by counsel. It is engrossed on paper, and one copy filed at the Crown-office, the other delivered to the defendant's attorney. If the prosecutor traverse, and also plead specially to the same part of the return, he must obtain a rule to plead several matters, as in civil actions.

"If the defendant neglect to reply to a special plea, or to add the similiter to the general issue, the prosecutor can compel him to do so, by obtaining a side-bar rule to reply from the Crown-office (pay 1s.), and serving a copy of it upon the defendant's attorney. This rule expires in four days (Reg. 17); and if the defendant do not reply or demur, or add the similiter within that time, the prosecutor may sign judgment as for want of a replication at the opening of the office on the morning of the fifth day, unless an order of the Court or of a judge, extending such time, shall have been obtained and served; and in such case judgment shall not be signed until the day after the expiration of the time granted by such order. (Reg. 18.)

"The Court, however, may allow such convenient time as they may think reasonable to the parties respectively to plead, reply, rejoin, or demur. (9 Anne, c. 20, s. 6.)

"The replication is pleaded in the same manner as the plea. (Vide supra.)

"The defendants may demur to the pleas, or the prosecutor to the replications as in ordinary civil actions; and in such cases the forms of the demurrer and joinder may be the same, mutatis mutandis, as those, ante, p. 63.

"And in general the pleadings under this stat. 9 Anne, c. 20, s. 2, should be in the ancient form observed on the Crown side of the court, and not in the forms required by the new rules of pleading, which, however applicable to the proceeding by demurrer under stat. 6 & 7 Vict. c. 67, do not seem to apply to the pleadings under the statute of Anne: the new rules of pleading apply to personal actions; and by the statute of Anne, it is only the proceedings after the traverse and replication, which are to be the same as in an action on the case for a false return."

In the concluding division, Mr. Archbold treats of the collateral proceedings; namely, the proceedings upon articles of the peace; attachment, in what cases, and the proceedings upon it; and habeas corpus—for the purpose of bailing a prisoner—of discharging him when illegally imprisoned, habeas corpus ad respondendum, habeas corpus ad testificandum, habeas corpus to remove a prisoner for trial; and habeas corpus to bring a prisoner up for judgment.

To increase the practical value of the work, the author has added upwards of 200 forms: and these are not thrown together at the end of the volume, which is almost as inconvenient as dividing the work into two volumes; but they are inserted just after the passages in the text to which they refer, so as to facilitate reference, and to enable the student at once to imprint upon his mind what he has been reading, by associating it with the method of applying it in practice. This plan is, as much as any plan can be, a substitute for the benefits of actual experience.

In a separate chapter are given the rules of the Court (including those of Hil. T. 1844), and the table of fees.

This analysis of the work, and the above extracts from it, will leave no more doubt upon the minds of our readers than exists in our own, that The Practice of the Crown Office of the Court of Queen's Bench will fully sustain the reputation of Mr. Archbold, and higher praise could not well be given.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S COURT.

June 29 and July 3 and 11.

Re Dyce Sombre, a Lunatic.

Petition by the lunatic to supersede the commission—A lunatic foreigner—How far peculiar habits and delusions are attributable to a foreign and oriental education—Report of a foreign tribunal of competent authority in favour of the sanity of the person found lunatic in this country—What evidence of the recovery of a lunatic will be required—Practice in lunacy—Conduct of the inquiry—How the insane party to be represented on the inquiry—Lunatic's access to papers.

Where the lunatic's delusions are entirely consequential upon an unfounded jealousy of his wife's fidelity, the wife, though she may be continued one of the committees of the person, will not be allowed any active superintendence or control over the lunatic; and the lunatic, if attended by a proper person, will be permitted to reside abroad, out of the jurisdiction.

In this matter Mr. Dyce Sombre, who had been found lunatic by the verdict of a jury, in July 1843, presented a petition to supersede the commission. The peculiarity of this case arose from the circumstance of Mr. Sombre being a half-caste East Indian, who had been bred and educated at the court of of his adopted mother, the Begum Sumroo, and who, notwithstanding he had been partially educated by the resident chaplain of the East India Company, and had associated much with the English residents at his native court, retained much of the habits of thought of an Oriental, particularly as regarded the demeanour of women in society. Mr. Sombre had married an English lady, and his insanity was evinced in an unreasonable and absurd jealousy, which led him into the commission of violent acts; but, apart from that subject, he conducted himself with propriety, and appeared to be in all respects competent to manage his own person and property.

In the autumn of 1843 Mr. Sombre escaped to France, where he entered into society, and was received in all respects as a sane man; and upon the English ambassador having made a demand upon the French Government for his extradition, an inquiry as to his sanity was directed. That inquiry was made under the superintendence of the constituted authorities, with the aid of some of the most eminent French physicians, and a report distinctly in favour of Mr. Sombre's sanity was the result. That report was much relied on by the petitioner's counsel.

Sir Thomas Wilde, Wakefield, and Walpole, for the petitioner, went at great length into the facts and the circumstances of Mr. Sombre's education; and they contended that, though a man of strong passions and violent prejudices, and, as such, was labouring under admitted delusions with respect to his wife's conduct, such delusions were not evidence of insanity. They were all to be attributed to his oriental birth and education, the existence of which was well known to the lady and her friends before the marriage. He had distinctly declared that he should expect his wife to conform to the customs of oriental wives, and Lord Combermere, as the mutual friend of Mr. Sombre and the lady's family, had pointed out to both parties the high degree of probability that unhappiness must be the result of the union. And his lordship founded his admonitions upon the peculiar notions of Mr. Sombre with regard to female propriety. In re Mitchell, MS. (of which case Mr. Wakefield produced the short-hand writer's notes) Lord Eldon had said that delusion upon one particular point formed no ground for a commission. [The Lord Chancellor.—In that case the particular delusions had existed for twenty-five years, and experience had shewn that they were not injurious to his person or property. Dr. Tuthill there gave an opinion that the delusions were not injurious to his person or property.] It was in evidence that to the mind of an Asiatic, acts of common courtesy, according to European habits, would be conclusive evidence of immorality. But for the accident of his marriage, there would have been no question as to Mr. Sombre's sanity. They referred to Mills's History of British India, vol. i. p. 387, and they read several passages from the Institutes of Menu (translated by Horton), ss. 12-13, p. 166, to shew that Mr. Sombre's views with respect to female propriety were strictly those of a native Hindoo. Such passages shew the origin of Mr. Sombre's delusions to have been consequent upon his Asiatic education, and such delusions are no more after six months' restraint than such as existed before his marriage. The evidence of medical men not acquainted with Indian customs must be looked at with caution. This is really only a case for police interference if Mr. Sombre's unreasonable jealousy should lead him to acts of violence. At all events, he should be allowed to live in France. In ex parte Rooke (1745), Lord Hardwicke suspended proceedings without superseding the commission, allowed the person found lunatic full liberty of his person, and restrained the committee from acting. So in re Stokes, before Lord Eldon, in 1813; re Fermon (Jacob, 403); re Bridge, before Lord Cottenham. In re Thomas, Lord Eldon allowed the party to go abroad with a medical man attending him.

Kelly, Bethel, Loftus Lowndes, and Calvert, for the committees of the person, read and commented upon the affidavits in opposition to the petition, which, as they contended, proved Mr. Sombre to be insane.

So much of the circumstances of the case as is necessary for the purposes of this report appears in the extracts we have given from the Lord Chancellor's judgment.

Tinney and Lloyd, for the committee of the estate.
Moore, for the next of kin.
Sir Thomas Wilde, in reply.

JUDGMENT.

Thursday, Aug. 8.—The Lord Chancellor.—This case has been argued at very great length at the bar, and a great quantity of evidence, consisting of affidavits and documents, has been laid before the Court in support of the allegations on the one side and on the other. I have read and considered them with that attention which the importance of the subject has appeared to me to demand. It is a question with respect to which I have felt much interest and anxiety, not merely on account of its relation to the interests of the individual whose soundness of mind is in question, but also because it has been supposed that the decision of this Court, or rather the verdict of the jury upon the commission issued under the authority of this Court, is at variance with the opinion expressed by those medical persons—men of great skill and science—who, under the authority of the Prefect of Police, made a report with respect to the state of Mr. Dyce Sombre's mind, in the month of December, in Paris. Two questions, two main questions, have been argued, and I think very properly argued, on this occasion. The first question is, whether Mr. Dyce Sombre ever has been of unsound mind—whether the finding of the jury upon the inquisition as to the unsoundness of his mind can, in fact, upon the evidence be supported; and, in the next place, the second and material question is, whether, supposing him to have been of unsound mind at that period, he has recovered his self-possession—whether, at the present moment, he is of unsound mind, or whether he is in a state fit to be intrusted with the management of his affairs and with the care of his own person. These are the two main questions which have been agitated and discussed in the course of the present extended inquiry. [His lordship then stated the history of Mr. Sombre to the time of his marriage.] It appears, therefore, that he has been educated to a considerable extent in English manners and language, and is acquainted with the habits of English society; and that although an Asiatic by birth, and in a great degree by descent, he cannot to any extent be considered as unacquainted with the character and manners of society in this country. Having stated thus much, I must observe that, on the other side, it has been urged that it is clear that in the mind of Mr. Dyce Sombre the prejudices or class of opinions which exist in Asiatics appear to have taken deep root, especially jealousy with regard to female connections. This displayed itself during the courtship in a very strong manner. It displayed itself in a manner too clear to admit of dispute; in short, he has exhibited a strong and deep-rooted feeling of jealousy, which it will be impossible from his early habits and associations to get rid of. It is not for me to say any thing as to the prudence of the connection which had been formed: that is not now a question before me. It appears, however, that after a treaty of marriage has gone on for a considerable time, Mrs. Dyce Sombre, who had originally rejected his offer, accepted him for her husband. After this he became dissatisfied with her conduct in going to parties with her father, unaccompanied by himself, and he evinced his feeling of jealousy in a variety of ways, so much so, that the lady broke off the connection. He went abroad, but was ultimately brought back by a letter from the lady. Further disputes occurred, arising out of his eccentricities, but they were finally married about Sept. 1841. They visited with the first society during the winter they remained in London, and so continued up to the month of April. Up to this time Mrs. Dyce Sombre had discovered nothing that could lead her to suppose that any thing of infirmity existed in her husband's mind. She knew of his jealous temperament before marriage, and found that the same feeling continued after marriage. She knew that it had been said that there could be no love without a mixture of jealousy; but neither before nor after her marriage, up to that time, had she observed the slightest indication, to her apprehension, of infirmity or unsoundness of mind. The first thing which invoked alarm on the part of Mrs. Dyce Sombre was a circumstance which she mentioned in her affidavit. While proceeding in the carriage on the journey, she turned round to look for a volume of Lodge's Peerage. It could not be found, and Mr. Dyce Sombre said he had taken it with him into Bond-street, and had held it out to the passers-by—that several persons had looked and laughed at him, and that at last a person took it and walked away with it. Mrs. Dyce Sombre made no remark, but was naturally much astonished at the statement, and was greatly alarmed. It made a deep impression on her mind. They went on to Donnington-park, and were received there by the Marchioness of Hastings. They stayed there two or three days, and on the day they quitted Donnington, Mr. Dyce Sombre made what might be called a confidential communication to the Marchioness. He stated to her that his wife was a profligate woman, and that she had had intercourse with all kinds of persons, both before and after her marriage. Lady Hastings was, of course, anxious to undeceive him, and told him that his wife was her intimate friend; that she had known her a very long time, and that there was not the slightest foundation for the imputation. Lady Hastings told Mrs. Dyce Sombre what had transpired, and this, of course, increased her alarm and anxiety. She, however, returned with her husband to Meaford (her father's), and there for a day or two nothing particular passed. One day, however, after dinner, when the family were all assembled at table, Mr. Dyce Sombre repeated what he had said to the Marchioness of Hastings, and added that both Lord and Lady St. Vincent knew it well, and had encouraged it. This led to great agitation, expostulation, and remonstrance, and eventually Mr. Dyce Sombre, with great reluctance, signed a paper stating that what he had said was incorrect. Soon after this, he was anxious to get to London, and they accordingly returned to town; when Dr. Chambers was sent for, and for a little time things went on as usual. In the course of the summer Mr. and Mrs. Dyce Sombre went to Worthing, and there at different periods he broke out with the same violence. His excitement became more intense, and he charged his wife with misconduct both before and after her marriage. They then again returned to London, and again mixed in society, though Mrs. Dyce Sombre's life was rendered unhappy by his continued acts of violence. Still they went on moving in the first ranks, and in the month of July they dined at Mr. Quintin Dick's. Mr. Dyce Sombre appeared much pleased, and told his wife to invite such of the company they had met at Mr. Dick's as she pleased, to meet her at her box at the theatre on the following night. Accordingly, Mrs. Dyce Sombre invited several, and among them Mr. Montgomery, with whom she was but slightly acquainted, and whom she desired to bring his sister with him. Nothing further took place. I mention this matter because it is an occurrence to which reference has afterwards been made. The party assembled at the theatre; Mr. Montgomery, however, did not continue in the box the whole of the evening, but returned and handed Mrs. Dyce Sombre to her carriage. A short time after this, Mr. and Mrs. Dyce Sombre received an invitation to dine with Captain and Mrs. Rous. They went there, and in passing near to the house of Captain Rous there was a hole made in the street in consequence of some repairs to the gas-pipes or the sewers. Mr. Dyce Sombre took some general notice of it, but nothing particular occurred at the time. They dined—the dinner went off as such things usually do, and they returned home. The autumn, or the season for quitting London, had now arrived, and it was determined by Mr. and Mrs. Dyce Sombre to go abroad, first to Berlin, and then to pass the winter at Paris. Mr. Dyce Sombre was in good spirits at that time; he enjoyed the journey extremely, but, on approaching Berlin he suddenly said, "I feel I am going mad, and I shall die in a madhouse;" to the great alarm and dismay of the lady. When they arrived at Berlin he again behaved with extreme violence—again charged his wife with having had connection with various persons of every description, both before and after her marriage. He said she had deceived him; that she had been an opera-dancer, and that he admired the skill and talent with which she had concealed that fact; and added, that, considering the life she had led, he was surprised she possessed such lady-like manners. He further stated that all this had been known to her father and mother, and that they had encouraged, abetted, and profited by it. These charges he over and over again had repeated, with the greatest possible violence, and Mrs. Dyce Sombre wished to have a physician called in; he refused, and would not have one until he got to Paris. The intended journey was then altered, and they went to Aix-la-Chapelle. Up to that period Mr. Dyce Sombre had never mentioned the name of any individual who was the particular object of his suspicion, but on arriving at Aix-la-Chapelle he exclaimed "I have hit upon the man—it is either the Duke of Wellington or Mr. Montgomery. Tell me which it is, and I will fight him." [His lordship then proceeded with great and most lucid accuracy to go through the various circumstances stated in the affidavits up to the time when it was found necessary to place Mr. Dyce Sombre under restraint.] The evidence shews the existence of feelings of extreme and absurd jealousy in Mr. D. Sombre's mind, which resulted in excessive violence towards his wife, quite inconsistent with sanity upon this particular topic. But in many other respects he appeared to be perfectly competent to manage himself and his affairs. Mrs. Dyce Sombre had been most unwilling to place her husband under restraint, and had only at last signed the necessary certificate in compliance with the urgent remonstrances of the medical men, and when there was reason to believe that he actually meditated her destruction. His lordship thought that upon the evidence there could be no doubt that at the time of the verdict Mr. Dyce Sombre was insane. It had been urged by the counsel for Mr. Dyce Sombre, that he was not aware at the time of the nature of the inquiry; and moreover that he not been fairly treated, as he was without professional advice; whereas Sir James Clark expressly declared that he tried over and over again to undeceive Mr. Dyce Sombre with respect to the erroneous conclusion which he had arrived at, that the proceedings had been instituted by the East-India Company. Now the very pertinacity with which Mr. Dyce Sombre adhered to that fallacious opinion was itself an evidence of a disordered intellect; otherwise he must have been convinced by what would have satisfied any well-organised mind. Sir J. Clark had asked Mr. Dyce Sombre whether he would like to have any counsel, and had himself suggested several of the most eminent to him, but in the absence of Mr. Cochrane, who was at the time in India, he declined to have any, and the letter of Mr. Freere to Mr. Dyce Sombre furnished him also the same explanation. How could it, therefore, be said that Mr. Dyce Sombre went to that inquiry in total ignorance of its nature and object? An unfounded charge had also been made against Mr. Freere, for not having furnished Mr. Dyce Sombre with counsel, although he had expressly refused to have any. It is my opinion that it was not the duty of Mr. Freere to provide counsel in the face of that refusal of Mr. Dyce Sombre, for it might possibly have laid his conduct open to the imputation of collusion. Many observations had been made about the box of papers taken by Mr. Dyce Sombre to Hanover-lodge, and it had been alleged that possession of it had been obtained by stratagem; and, in proof of such an accusation, a letter of Mrs. Dyce Sombre's had been referred to. True it was, that the letter alluded to suggested the propriety of obtaining the box by a contrivance, in order to avoid exciting Mr. Dyce Sombre's mind, which, as Mrs. Dyce Sombre at that time of course considered her husband insane, was a very proper and considerate precaution. That imputation, therefore, upon Mrs. Dyce Sombre's character was without foundation; and from the first I never supposed that she had been actuated by any improper motive in the writing of the letter in question. It had, however, been further charged, that the box contained letters and papers, which, if produced at the inquiry under the commission, would, in all probability, have led the jury to come to a different conclusion to the one they came to. Now Mr. Dyce Sombre ought unquestionably to have been permitted to use those papers, and it was much to be regretted that he had been deprived of them at the inquisition; but, after a most careful perusal of them, I am of opinion that, taking them with the rest of the evidence laid before the jury, and also giving the fullest weight to all the arguments of counsel, the jury would have come to the same conclusion they did, even if these documents had been before them at the time they pronounced Mr. Dyce Sombre insane. The other question I am now called upon to decide is whether Mr. Dyce Sombre has so far recovered since as to justify the commission being superseded? The invariable principle and practice of this Court is, that when once a jury has pronounced a person to be insane, the clearest possible case must be made out of recovery before the Court can interfere to set aside the commission. Several cases have come before me lately where the test of recovery has been most strict; in one instance, an application was made to me to supersede a commission by a gentleman who alleged that he had recovered from the delusions under which he had formerly laboured. An examination took place at my instigation by some eminent medical gentlemen, who reported that they considered the applicant to be perfectly sane. I myself then examined him, with other medical men, and had a long conversation with the alleged lunatic upon the subject of his delusions, and he then admitted that he was fully conscious that he had been out of his mind, but that as his health became restored, the delusions gradually left him. That is the proper state of things, that the person should be conscious of his previous delusions, and that they have left him; and not still to adhere to them as if they were true. [His lordship then referred to Mr. D. Sombre's conduct since the commission, and to the imperfect information furnished to the French physicians who had reported in favour of Mr. Sombre's sanity.] So far, therefore, from the report of the French physicians being at variance with the decisions of the English medical gentlemen, my belief is that, had they had the same evidence before them, they would have come to precisely the same opinion. Again, with respect to the delusions of Mr. Dyce Sombre about ghosts, with what skill he alluded to that fact, and stated to the French physicians that he was only worried by the guardians entering his room at night abruptly, while they were in total ignorance of the many occasions which he stated that he had been visited by spirits. Can this examination be called a correct representation of the facts? Or have not these French physicians come to an incorrect opinion from not having had the whole of the evidence placed in detail before them—from never having tried and tested the real seat of Mr. Dyce Sombre's insanity? With the greatest respect for the skill and ability of those medical gentlemen, I am of opinion that they have come to a wrong conclusion respecting Mr. Dyce Sombre's state of mind—not an erroneous opinion from the facts brought under their notice, but from the want of sufficient information upon the different heads of his disorder. But what places the matter beyond a doubt, and proves to demonstration that Mr. Dyce Sombre was still labouring under the same delusions at Paris as in England, are the affidavits of Mr. Quintin Dick and Mr. Okey; those gentlemen spoke of his delusions respecting his wife's infidelity being as strong as ever, and that he talked of referring her conduct to the Jockey Club at Paris. One hundred men, therefore, of the greatest skill might examine and report a person to be sane if they were not aware of his particular delusion; but can their evidence be put in competition with the direct testimony of Mr. Dick and Mr. Okey, who spoke to particular facts and acts of insanity, the more so, as the conversation with Mr. Dyce Sombre about his wife's intrigues, and that he had several ladies of rank offered to him by their husbands, and that the Queen had promised him a peerage to hush it up, and other absurd declarations of the same kind, took place immediately after the examination by the French physicians? Under all the circumstances, I can by no means say with the French physicians that Mr. Dyce Sombre was at that time in a sound state of mind. [His lordship then examined the evidence of the English physicians in the case who thought Mr. Sombre insane.] On the other side there have been filed, on the behalf of Mr. Dyce Sombre, the affidavits of medical men, four or five in number,—of Dr. Paris, the President of the College of Physicians; of Mr. Lawrence, a surgeon of great eminence; of Mr. Copeland, a surgeon of great eminence; of Mr. Key, a surgeon of great eminence; and of a physician of the name of Dixon. The affidavit of Mr. Lawrence in substance states, that the deponent visited Mr. Dyce Sombre on the 23rd of June; that he had a conversation with him on various subjects; that his remarks and answers to questions put to him were perfectly rational and proper; that when his wife was mentioned he appeared unwilling to enter upon that subject, saying that he had explained every thing to Dr. Southey, and that he would not go into that matter again, as it made his head ache. The affidavit of Mr. Lawrence goes on to state that it did not appear that Mr. Dyce Sombre bore any ill will towards his wife, but that he entertained a strong and unfounded impression as to her conduct; that the deponent could not ascertain the exact origin, the nature, or the extent of this impression, partly from the repugnance of Mr. Dyce Sombre to enter upon the subject, and partly from his want of quickness. The source of mischief, however, appeared to be jealousy operating upon the excitable character of an Asiatic. After alluding to his rationality during his late residence in France, the affidavit concludes by the expression of an opinion, that if placed under restraint he would really become deranged, but that, with the qualification of a doubt respecting the nature and origin of the impression entertained by Mr. Dyce Sombre on the subject of his wife, the deponent considers he is not of unsound mind; and that, therefore, he ought to be restored to his liberty. Now no person could be more able than the gentleman who had made that affidavit, but it is impossible not to feel the doubt and hesitation which prevail throughout the whole of it. It is, however, supported by the affidavits of the other medical gentlemen whose names I have mentioned; but they all appear to have been drawn up with doubt and hesitation as to the real state of Mr. Dyce Sombre's mind. I cannot put these affidavits in competition with those on the other side, which are founded upon facts as to stated delusions corresponding with the delusions which formerly existed, delusions of so marked a character as to constitute, in my opinion, unsoundness and infirmity of mind. It is the duty of this Court not to supersede a commission once issued on the supposed ground that the party has recovered, unless upon clear and satisfactory evidence. In a conflict of evidence (if this could be so considered), I should not be justified in at present superseding the commission. But the case does not rest here. I felt it to be my duty to see Mr. Dyce Sombre personally, and to call in to my assistance Dr. Southey and Dr. Bright to take part in the examination. I requested them to make to me a report, which I have received. It is a faithful account of what took place, although it does not set forth to the full extent the delusions which at the time appeared to me to exist. [His lordship then read that report, which shewed the continued existence of Mr. Dyce Sombre's delusions.] That report contains this statement with reference to Mr. Dyce Sombre's conduct with respect to duels. "He admitted that he entertained strong suspicions concerning Sir Frederick Bathurst, to whom he imputed an adulterous intercourse with his wife; and he would not allow that it was a hasty step on mere suspicion to send a hostile message to Sir F. Bathurst, with whom it appeared that he has very recently expostulated on the subject of this imputed infidelity of his wife. On being interrogated as to the introduction of deleterious drugs into his food, he expressed his conviction that such practices had taken place, and he described to us certain painful sensations in parts of his body which were intended to be injuriously affected thereby. Mr. Dyce Sombre did not conceal from us the fact of his having recommended his wife to send a challenge to Lady ——, on the ground that both that lady and Mrs. Dyce Sombre regarded favourably a particular individual, and he expressed his belief that such a step was natural and proper when the affections of two ladies happened to be directed towards the same person. He told us further, that he himself had proposed to his wife to fight a duel with her, she taking one pistol for that purpose, and he the other." I ought to have alluded to the letter written by Mrs. Dyce Sombre, and referred to in the report of the physicians. I have never seen that letter, but I have reason to know that it is a letter offering to go to the continent for the purpose of travelling with, and taking care of, her husband. It has been suggested in the course of the argument, that this is inconsistent with her notions as to his insanity. Now I do not think such an inference can or ought to be drawn. She has lived with him under his delusion at the imminent peril of her life. She has always been unwilling that he should be put under restraint. She has heard, that while in Paris the delusions had ceased, and, therefore, what is there unnatural in an affectionate wife wishing to take her husband under her especial care, in the hope that by attention and vigilance he might be cured of the disorder under which he has laboured for so long a period of time? There is another observation which also I must make. It appears to me most extraordinary that Mr. Freere (the solicitor to the commission) should have left Paris at the time he did. He knew that an inquiry was about to take place there; he knew that important facts might be given in proof before the parties to whom the inquiry was intrusted, and yet on the very eve of that inquiry, he who was possessed of the most accurate information on the subject left his post, and left the French authorities to grope their way in the dark. I have heard no satisfactory explanation of that course of conduct, which has impressed itself strongly on my mind throughout the inquiry. I cannot ascribe it to any cause, nor can I divine the motive. It has been said that Mr. Freere thought it unnecessary to attend, because the French authorities had already made up their minds on the subject. I will not allow such an imputation to be made, because I am sure those gentlemen conducted their investigation in good faith, with perfect bona fides, and with a view to come to a proper result. Mr. Freere ought to have attended, and not deserted his post on an occasion when his client was so deeply interested.

The result of the whole case then is, that it is impossible for me to supersede the commission. Those who have attended to the detail of facts I have developed must be satisfied that, for the present at least, I must refuse to supersede the commission. Another consideration is, as to the course which is to be taken. The closing part of the affidavit of Mr. Lawrence, for whose judgment and skill I entertain the greatest possible respect, is well deserving attention. He states, that if Mr. Dyce Sombre is treated as a lunatic (by which Mr. Lawrence means shut up in confinement), nothing would be more likely than that he might become deranged, while, if the great source of his present irritation were removed, he, no doubt, would become tranquil and rational. Now during his residence in France, Mr. Dyce Sombre conducted himself properly and well, and I feel it my duty to take that circumstance into my consideration before I finally make any order on the subject. If Mr. Dyce Sombre is willing, under proper care, to return to France, there will be no difficulty on the part of the Court to adopt such suggestion. At present, however, it is impossible for me, on the evidence to which I have adverted, under the circumstances, to supersede the commission. I think the wife, though continued as one of the committees of the person, should have as little interference as possible, as it might operate injuriously to the lunatic. On all these grounds the only order I can at present make is, to refuse the application.

ADMIRALTY COURT.

Friday, July 21.

THE LORD COCHRANE.

Bottomry Bond.—Persons advancing money on bottomry are entitled to require, and, in cases of distress, the master is entitled to give, the security of the cargo as well as the ship and freight, and the master cannot in every case be expected to consult with the shippers on the subject.

The most stringent necessity alone will justify the master in unshipping the cargo or in selling the vessel.

An action to recover the amount lent upon a bottomry-bond which was given at Pernambuco upon the ship, freight, and cargo of the Lord Cochrane.

The Lord Cochrane, belonging to Mr. Benson, of Liverpool, left that port in the spring of 1839, bound for the Island of Ascension, with Government stores. She was afterwards to sail to Pernambuco for a cargo homewards. She landed the stores and proceeded to Pernambuco, according to her original destination, and took a homeward freight; but leaving port, she ran on the bar and suffered such serious damage that she was compelled to put back for repair. The master not having the necessary means, entered into negotiation with Mr. Saunders, of the house of M'Calmont and Co. of Pernambuco, who furnished him with money, on the security of a bottomry-bond upon the ship, cargo, and freight. The owners of the ship and freight have not disputed the validity of the bond, but the owners of the cargo having refused to pay their share, amounting to no less than 5,000*l.* the present action has been brought.

Addams and Bayford, for the owners of the cargo.—The only question as to the validity of the bond appertained to the cargo. The cargo was subject to very different considerations from the ship and freight. Until the decision in the case of the Gratitudine (3 Robinson, 240), it had been a question, whether the master, under any circumstances, could hypothecate the cargo; but there, Lord Stowell had held that he might hypothecate the cargo under very particular and special circumstances. But were there any special circumstances here? Was the master driven to the last extremity? Had he no other alternative? Mr. Sanders was the agent of the owners, and money could have been obtained from him on personal credit. If not, he ought to have given distinct notice that he would not grant money on credit, and then the master might have unshipped the cargo, or have sold the vessel; and if he did not choose to take that responsibility upon himself, he should have written home for instructions. The advances made on the security of the bond were for the benefit of the ship and freight, but were not for the benefit of the cargo, whose owners ought, at any rate, to have been consulted, and it was unjust to fix upon them so heavy a liability.

Harding and Elphinstone, in support of the bond, were not called upon.

Dr. LUSHINGTON pronounced judgment.—Before I came into court I had carefully read over the papers in this case; and the original impression which was made upon my mind as to the validity of this bond, has not, in any degree, been changed by the arguments to which I have listened. The bond is upon the ship, the freight, and the cargo, and it certainly is to a very large amount; but whether that amount is consistent with the validity of the bond depends entirely upon the facts and circumstances of the case. The owners of the ship, and of the freight, who are the parties that appear in this court, though, in fact, the underwriters are the parties concerned, have not defended the bond as relates to the ship and freight. But that certainly is no reason why those who are interested in the cargo should not make use of any defence competent to them by law, against the bond, if any such defence they have. Now, one of the grounds which is generally put forward against the validity of a bond is, that either a necessity for it does not exist, or that the necessity was not of so urgent a nature as to require that it should be put in operation, as has been done in this case. But it is quite apparent, upon a consideration of this subject, that the greater the damage which has occurred—the larger the expense which has been incurred—the greater is the necessity for including the cargo, and for this obvious and plain reason—that the ship itself may be insufficient to discharge the bond, and, therefore, all persons advancing money where it is a large sum, require, as they have a right to do, the security of the ship, freight, and cargo; and I think that the legal principles upon this subject do not appear to have been clearly understood, in the opposition which has been made to this bond. I conceive that those who advance money on bottomry, whatever may be the amount which they undertake to advance, however they look to the value of the ship and freight, or to the value of the cargo, have a perfect right to take for their protection security on all three; and there is one reason which is quite apparent among others, viz. that it may happen, and has happened over and over again in these courts, that the ship itself, though of more than ample value at the time of the bond, either from subsequent misfortunes, or from being wrecked and stranded, has become wholly insufficient to defray the bottomry-bond, and the cargo has then been called in aid. Now, let us look at some of the facts connected with this transaction; and I will address myself to those facts, taking into my consideration at the same time one of the arguments which has been very much pressed on behalf of those who oppose the bond, viz. that Mr. Saunders, resident at Pernambuco, was the agent of Mr. Benson, the owner of the ship. It appears that this vessel, being the property of Mr. Benson, destined on a voyage to Ascension, and thence to Pernambuco, was not by him addressed to the firm of M'Calmont and Co. in Pernambuco; but that a conversation took place between him and one of the partners of the firm in London—connected certainly with that at Pernambuco; and in the course of that conversation it also clearly appears that the impression on Mr. Benson's mind was, that in all probability the vessel, when it arrived at Pernambuco, would be put in the hands of the Pernambuco house. That any such impression was conveyed to the London house is not so clear, but it is of no importance. Mr. Benson gives instructions to the master, which are sufficient for his guidance when he arrives at Pernambuco, and which he would be bound to follow unless extraordinary circumstances intervened, viz. to address himself to the house of M'Calmont and Co. at Pernambuco. But Mr. Benson causes no communication to be made to that house; he does not say to them that he adopts them as his agents; he does not state that he will honour their bills, nor does the master leave this country with any credit on the house at Pernambuco, or upon any one else. Now suppose for the moment that they are to be considered the agents for the owners—and I think that, in one sense of the term, undoubtedly they became the agents of the ship—it was their duty, having accepted that office, to perform all that was incumbent upon them in that capacity; and so they did, for they cause a full cargo to be procured, themselves being amongst the greatest shippers, and they defray the expenses, and draw on Mr. Benson for the amount, he being a person of known respectability. This transaction being over, the ship sails, but she meets with an accident almost on the point of leaving the port, which renders it imperative to bring back the ship to Pernambuco. Then there is much discussion as to whether the agency was resumed or not; but that, in my opinion, is not of the slightest importance, because I have yet to learn that even if the agency of the vessel were resumed, as contended for on behalf of the owners of the cargo, that it could really make any alteration in the legal bearing of this case. Now the vessel comes in; it is surveyed in the usual manner; survey upon survey takes place, and the greatest uncertainty prevails as to what will be necessary to be done in order to render her seaworthy, to accomplish her voyage to the port of Liverpool; and most probably the assistance and interference of the agent at Lloyd's was called in; for I am at a loss to consider how it would be reconcilable with duty, either upon the part of the master or the house at Pernambuco, to have acted in a matter of this description, in which they knew that an interest must necessarily exist at Lloyd's, without the concurrence and approbation of Lloyd's agent. It has generally been considered in these courts, and I apprehend most properly considered, that one of the greatest safeguards in transactions of this description is the recurrence to Lloyd's agent; because a person of this description must be supposed to be selected on account of his experience and character. It appears from the affidavit of Mr. Saunders, that it was not till the latter end of August that the expenses of the repairs were known; and it is contended as against the validity of this bond, that having previously acted as agents for the ship, it was the duty of the house at Pernambuco to give distinct notice that they would no longer advance money on credit. But did they advance money on credit at all, or did they make themselves responsible for one sixpence of these repairs without security? Of course I must look to the affidavit made in the case, and which is not contradicted by any one fact or circumstance. Mr. Saunders says, "that previously to the commencement of any of the said repairs, and before this deponent had made or undertaken to make, the said firm of M'Calmont and Co. of Pernambuco, in any manner liable or responsible to any person whatsoever for the expenses of any of the said repairs, it was distinctly understood, and agreed by and between the said master of the said ship and this deponent, on the behalf of the said firm of M'Calmont and Co. that the said master should, previously to the sailing of the said vessel, execute a bottomry-bond, at the usual rate of maritime interest." Now, I apprehend, then, that if this affidavit is entitled to credit—and I know no reason why it is not—that the master had distinct notice. But what are the cases, and what are the legal positions on the subject? It cannot be contended that an agent is not at liberty to advance money on bottomry. We know that years and years ago, where the agent had advanced money to a certain extent, not on bottomry, he was held justified in taking a bond, and requiring bottomry for the expense incurred. That was the case of the Augusta, decided by Lord Stowell about 1809 or 1810. (1 Dodson, 283.) If this be so, an agent is not bound, because he takes on himself the character of the agent of a ship, to advance or become responsible for a single farthing. This case has been argued as if the credit of Mr. Benson in this country were exactly the same thing as if he had an actual credit, and could have had money advanced in Pernambuco. The question I am to consider is, not the responsibility of Mr. Benson, even if a bill had been drawn upon him; but would any one at Pernambuco, under the existing circumstances, have been content to advance money, and take the chance of procuring it from Mr. Benson, who had cautiously taken care that no person should render him responsible for a single farthing—for it does not appear that he gave the master power to draw at Pernambuco for a shilling, nor that he had any communication with Pernambuco at all; much less that he authorized the house to draw upon him for one sixpence! Now all the circumstances of the case are in precise unison with its being an advance on bottomry. Advertisements in July, or notifications, whichever they are called, were posted up in the place of the greatest publicity, and where, of course, the very shippers of the cargo, according to the evidence in the case, must have been cognizant of the fact; and there were subsequent advertisements in the newspapers; and yet it is not pretended that any person was desirous to come forward and advance one-tenth of the sum requisite. Now this brings me to another part of the case—I mean to the conduct of the master with reference to the shippers of the cargo. It is said that in many cases it would be incumbent on the master, before he takes a bottomry-bond, to have communication with the owners of the cargo, where it can be practised, and to take their directions; but really this observation must be taken with great limitation, looking at the circumstances of this case. There are a great many shippers, whom no one in this country can know. It is very true that if these shippers had been ignorant of the circumstances, it would have been a strong argument against the bonâ fide conduct of the master that he had had no communication with them; but the shippers were on the spot; they must have been cognizant of the transaction. I am not speaking from an inference of my own, but from facts spoken of in the affidavits. If they had thought it for their interest to interfere for the protection of the cargo, any one was at liberty so to do; but it only appears that one or two, having the slightest interest in the cargo, too trivial to mention, really took any share in the transaction. Now, to follow the case up a little further, let us see what are the alternatives offered to the master on this occasion. It is said that he might have unshipped the cargo—perhaps he might. Is there any one authority that can be quoted, that shews that the master was bound to unship under any circumstances? If he were, it would lead to this circumstance, that in all cases where a cargo could be unshipped, you could not bind it by a bottomry-bond. This is contrary to all practice and to all decided cases. Why is it that the master is not bound? I apprehend for this reason, because it would be dangerous to intrust him with too large a discretion; and that, though in some individual cases it might be beneficial to the particular owners, yet upon the whole it would be exceedingly dangerous to invest the master with any such great discretion. It is not merely a question of vitiating the insurance. The master may not, under all the circumstances of this case, have seen what was the precise path of duty as regards the owner of the ship as well as regards the owners of the cargo, and how their respective interests might have been affected if he had taken upon himself to unship the cargo. One thing is clear, that at this time he knew nothing of the amount of expense; it was impossible for him to tell what it would be. Was he to sacrifice the whole freight? Suppose that upon the accident occurring he had taken upon himself to unship the cargo, and that the letter directing the owners to insure it had failed in reaching its destination, would there have been no liability? These are not matters so clear as they seem to be, but would have been dangerous to the master unless he clearly saw the way to the equitable protection of all persons concerned in the ship, freight, and cargo. It was observed that he might have corresponded with the owners at home. What would have been the consequence of that? He must have locked up the ship and cargo for three months before any thing was done; and then at the end of it, is it not most probable that he would have been left to the exercise of his own discretion? And would it have been possible to have got all the persons interested in the cargo to have united with the owner of the ship to point out the precise course to pursue? It is vain to suppose that, in these fluctuating circumstances, changing from day to day, he is to wait for instructions which cannot be received within three months in the shortest possible time, and in all probability longer. One other observation has been made, and that is, that he might have sold the ship. Again, I should have liked to have had some authority for this position. A sale at Pernambuco of a ship condemned as unseaworthy—a sale not sanctioned by Lloyd's agent—what sort of a title would the purchaser obtain, and what sort of a price would the owner get? But there is no authority or order to authorize the master in selling the vessel. There must be the most urgent necessity for it—not mere expediency—that is never held to be a valid ground. No doubt, by the later cases it has been said, and truly said, that in cases of undoubted necessity, where the ship and cargo would be totally lost, unless the cargo were taken out and the ship sold, the master may sell; but, really, the stringency of the circumstances must be so great, that it is very difficult to define beforehand what are the circumstances which would not only justify the sale, but give a good title. It is not necessary for me, however, to enter into this question, because I am clearly of opinion that there was nothing in this case that would justify the master in having recourse to such a proceeding. It only remains to observe, in a few words, as to the great amount of repairs, the charges that have been made, and the averments that a bill of exchange might have been taken and bottomry have been saved. Suppose in this individual case that a bill of exchange had been taken, and the bottomry-bond taken also as a security, or rather, as we call it in these courts, the bill of exchange had been taken as a collateral security; we know that it is the every day practice, when the bill of exchange is paid, that the bottomry-bond is not sued for. But, is it not optional on the part of the person who advances his money to take a bottomry-bond and a bill of exchange, and when the vessel has arrived, to say, "I will be content with taking the ordinary premium, and I will not charge you with the bond?" But how that can have the slightest operation upon the validity of the bond I am at a loss to conceive. If the charges made for the repairs have been excessive, or there is any thing in the other charges contrary to the usages and the customs of merchants, and against all sound principles of justice and equity, the amount of the charges may be referred to the registrar and merchants, and these charges cut down according to their decision, subject to the adjudication of the Court, if there is any difference among them. But really there is nothing of the kind in this case; it is not contended that there is any thing excessive in this commission. It is five per cent. and two-and-a-half. It does not strike me that it is excessive, but if it is, it is a matter for the registrar and merchants, and not for the Court to determine. With regard to the premium itself, precisely the same observation must be made. The Court has never been in the habit of pronouncing against a bottomry-bond on that account. I remember that when I was at the bar I had to urge Lord Stowell strongly on the point where the premium was 40*l.* between Corunna and Portsmouth. His lordship said that that was a matter for reference, because the amount of the premium would depend on a variety of circumstances, whether money was scarce at the port, and so on, which the Court could not decide till an investigation had taken place. Now, I am happy to say, that in the present case fraud has been no longer contended for; I see nothing fraudulent; on the contrary, I think I see an earnest desire on the part of Mr. Saunders, who acted for M'Calmont and Co. to do his duty fairly between all the parties. He was placed in a situation of great difficulty, not from his own fault. He was invested with no specific power by the owner of the ship; he was left to the exercise of his own discretion, and might meet with unexpected circumstances incapable of being defined at the time the accident took place, or for weeks after, till the ship was laid open and examined. He was placed in that situation that the demands were growing, but he could not tell the extent to which they would go. I see no fault in that gentleman's conduct, and I see nothing to reflect upon him in any part of the correspondence. I have only to express my regret that circumstances have taken place which have rendered the period so long before the parties are entitled to receive the amount of the bond. Suffice it to say, that I hope no greater delay has taken place in this court than communication with Brazil rendered necessary and safe for all parties concerned in the bond. I pronounce for the bond, with the ordinary interest from the time it became due.

Bankrupt and Insolvent Courts.

(Before Mr. Commissioner Evans.)

Thursday, Sept. 19.

Married woman petitioner under the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96—Variance between petition and balance-sheet.

Isabella Pringle Ross, sued as Isabella Pringle Scott (but the wife of David Ross, of 37, Sackville-street, Saint James's, commercial traveller), a petitioning debtor, was heard this day before Mr. Commissioner Evans. She was opposed by Buchanan, of Basinghall-street, for Thomas Grainger, a coal merchant, of Grosvenor Basin, and supported by Bagley, the barrister. It appeared she contracted the debt with this creditor before her marriage with Ross, as also a heavy debt with Messrs. Lyon and another, and was sued by them before her marriage in her maiden name Scott, and was at their suit committed to the Queen's Prison two years since, but soon after her coverture she filed a petition in the Insolvent Court by the name of Scott, and filed her schedule, but declined to be heard before that Court, and chose to petition this Court on the 20th of August last.

Buchanan, the attorney for the opposing creditor, raised the following objections: 1st, that the petitioner, being a married woman, and not being a trader according to the custom of London, was not an object contemplated by the Act of Parliament. 2nd. That she had misdescribed herself, as she had been a lodging-house keeper, and in an affidavit made by her in 1842 in a cause Lyon and Another v. the Petitioner, she swore she was at that time a lodging-house keeper, and her debts being more than 300*l.* her petition must be dismissed on the ground of being a trader within the meaning of the bankrupt laws. 3rd. That the petition was defective, as she had stated in her balance-sheet she had paid her attorney 5*l.* towards the costs of the petition, and had not mentioned that fact in her petition; therefore, by the express language of the second clause, the petition must be dismissed. 4th. That she had put her name to an accommodation bill since the contracting of most of her present debts, and had honoured the said bill with the money she ought to have paid to her creditors.

After a lengthened argument, which occupied upwards of an hour, the Court named a day for the final order, but with an understanding that if the attorney for the petitioner did not attend on that day to explain the 5*l.* paid him on account, the petition would be dismissed. This was the first case of a non-trader and a married woman being a petitioner to this Court.

Re Baker.

Effect of dismissing prisoner's petition.

In this case the insolvent was a prisoner in the Queen's Bench prison, where he had petitioned the Court, and been discharged on an interim order. He now appeared for his first examination, when it was shewn that his debts exceeded 300*l.* and as he was a trader, the case was beyond the commissioner's jurisdiction.

Hughes applied to the Court to remand the insolvent to his former custody, pursuant to 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96, s. 24.

Mr. Commissioner Evans said he had no power to remand him as desired, but that the creditor might take him again in execution, according to sec. 6, as the interim order now ceased to protect the petitioner. It lay entirely with himself to commit his debtor to prison.

Re Waterfield.

This insolvent had also been a prisoner, and had obtained his discharge on filing his petition. Not appearing when called for, his petition was dismissed; the detaining creditor, as in the last case, being left to a second execution. The Commissioner's power to remand was stated to be confined only to cases in which he refused to name a day for a final order under the circumstances set forth in sec. 24.

Re Haslam.

Petition not restored after dismissal.

The insolvent, a discharged debtor, being called, did not appear. His petition was consequently dismissed. After the lapse of a short time, Horry, for the insolvent, applied to have another day appointed for the examination, stating that on the previous evening the petitioner was labouring under a severe attack of fever, notwithstanding which he had declared his intention to attend. His solicitor had only just been apprised of this fact, to which his absence was attributed. He proposed, therefore, to file an affidavit of the cause of absence, and serve fresh notices as a condition for a second appointment for hearing.

Mr. Commissioner Evans declined to restore the petition to the file. It had been dismissed, and he could do more in the matter.

Re Lewis.

Uncertificated bankrupt's petition.

The petitioner was a trader owing on his schedule less than 300*l.* It transpired, however, that he had formerly been a bankrupt, and had not obtained a certificate.

Mr. Commissioner Evans thought that, such being the case, the debts owing under the commission ought to have been inserted in the present schedule, when the whole amount would have exceeded the prescribed sum. The petition was therefore dismissed.

COUNTRY COMMISSIONERS' COURTS.

BRISTOL DISTRICT BANKRUPTCY COURT.

(Before Mr. Commissioner Stevenson.)

Saturday, Sept. 21.

Re Mozoomdar.

In what cases an insolvent's petition must be dismissed.

This insolvent's petition was presented before the passing of the late Act, 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96. At the first hearing, Smith and Homes appeared to oppose, on behalf of various creditors, and Stone supported the insolvent.

It appeared that within a few days of filing the petition, the insolvent had obtained goods on credit from various tradesmen, and that he had made over all his property, including these goods to a relative.

The examination having been adjourned to this day, the insolvent did not appear when called; upon which Smith applied for the dismissal of the petition, urging that, as the petitioner did not appear to support it, it was the only course open to the Court, and that there was no power given to the Court to proceed with the petition under the circumstances of this case.

Homes, contrà.—The dismissal of the petition will be injurious to the interests of most of the creditors, inasmuch as some of them have executions which may be levied upon, and will absorb all the property. If the petition proceeds, the property will be fairly distributed, and will pay a good dividend to every creditor. The absence of the insolvent is no ground for the dismissal of the petition, which has been properly presented to the Court, and all the requisites made by the Acts conditions precedent to the right of the Court to entertain jurisdiction over the petition, have been complied with. These conditions under 5 & 6 Vict. c. 116, were, 1st, not being a trader owing 300*l.*; 2ndly, the notices required by that Act, but now abolished; 3rd, residence within the district; and, fourth, a full schedule. The absence of any one of these requisites was a ground, and the only ground, for dismissing the petition, because without them the Court had no jurisdiction. If it appear that the insolvent has contracted debts by fraud, the course to be adopted is pointed out by the 24th section of the new Act; that is, to refuse to name any day for the final order; no power is given to dismiss the petition on that ground.

Smith.—But the insolvent has not annexed a full schedule to his petition; he has omitted [illegible] debts.

Homes.—Even that does not [illegible] on the Court to dismiss the petition [illegible] may be amended by the [illegible] 8th section of the late Act [illegible] to proceed with the petition, notwithstanding the death of the petitioner.

His Honour.—I think I have no alternative but to dismiss the petition. It must not be forgotten that this petition was presented before the passing of the late Act, and it is very doubtful whether the provisions of that Act apply to this petition. It is clear that many of the provisions do not apply. Under the old practice, if an insolvent did not attend to support his petition it was always dismissed.

Homes referred to Lord Huntingtower's case, where the first hearing was adjourned, although his lordship did not attend.

His Honour.—In that case the petitioner's solicitor attended for him, and stated the cause of Lord Huntingtower's absence. In this case, the insolvent has sent to the court a notice that he withdraws his petition. He has not passed his first examination, and it is only on his passing that examination that the Court has the power to name, or refuse to name, a day for the final order. As the insolvent does not appear to conclude his examination, and support his petition, it must be dismissed.

Petition dismissed accordingly.

REVISION OF VOTERS FOR THE BOROUGH OF BRIDGWATER.

Wednesday, Sept. 25.

(Before Charles Saunders, Esq. Revising Barrister.)

Power of amendment under 6 Vict. c. 18.

William Bryant was objected to on the ground that he was not rated to all rates made for the relief of the poor during the year ending 31st July last.

It was proved by the voter that he was in occupation of a house of the required value, and had been called on and paid to the overseer all the rates made during the year.

On production of the rate-books, it appeared that his name and the property he occupied had been totally omitted from two out of three rates made during the year.

On the part of the objector it was submitted that this was a bad vote, in consequence of the omission, and that the error of the overseers (such it being proved to be) was not remedied by the 75th section of the 6th Vict. c. 18, which applies only to cases of misnomers or inaccurate or insufficient description in the rates of the person or property.

Mr. Saunders.—This is a case which falls within the mischief intended to be remedied by the 75th section. The voter here has occupied, is the person liable to be rated, and has been bonâ fide called on to pay, and in fact has paid these rates, and I hold that it is an insufficient description, which I have power, by the 75th section of the new Act, to correct; for if the claimant is not rated at all, it is clear he is insufficiently rated. Vote allowed.

There were four other persons objected to on the same grounds, whose votes were also allowed.

The objector applied for a case, which the revising barrister declined to state.

THE LEGISLATOR.

Summary.

We request the attention of our readers to the article on Mr. Fitzroy Kelly's Bill for establishing appeals in criminal cases. It is only by submitting proposed reforms in the law to a candid examination of the Profession that such changes can be safely made. There are always a number of minute points which escape the attention of the framer, in the first instance, and can generally be supplied by no one so well as by those conversant with the practical workings of the existing law. To give a well-known instance: no commissioner in bankruptcy, or attorney in the habit of attending to bankruptcy proceedings, would have omitted to give any power of distribution to the assignees under 5 & 6 Vict. c. 116.

We publish to-day a record of all the proceedings in private Bills during the last session, similar to the one in our first volume. The discussion on the propriety of the conduct of the lay and law lords in O'Connell's case still proceeds in the daily journals, and the continuance of the House of Lords as the court of supreme appeal, has been canvassed in various quarters. This subject will, no doubt, be presented in some tangible form next session.

Bills in Progress.

MR. FITZROY KELLY'S BILL

TO PROVIDE AN APPEAL IN CRIMINAL CASES.

No one who feels any interest in the due administration of the law of this country can do otherwise than rejoice at the praiseworthy attempts made by Mr. Fitzroy Kelly to provide an appeal in criminal cases. It is due to the character of the criminal law; it is an obligation under which the legislature lies to the humbler classes of this kingdom, who are chiefly the objects of penal inflictions, that this appeal should be allowed. Future ages will look back with wonder and amazement at that cruel system of criminal jurisprudence which deprived an accused party of those checks against error, ignorance, and falsehood, which are available to all when the subject-matter of litigation is merely that of some civil injury; they will scarcely believe the annals of history when they read, that down to the middle of the nineteenth century, a party accused of crime had no means of appealing against a decision affecting his liberty or life, though that decision may have been contrary to law, and in open violation of all the good sense and facts of the case; they will believe it morally impossible that any nation possessed of the ordinary attributes of humanity could suffer for a single hour so cruel a state of things to exist. Nevertheless, such a state of things does exist, and that, too, with the concurrence (passive though it be) of many enlightened and benevolent individuals, whose position and influence in the state are such that any measure they might advocate of a rational character would surely meet with consideration and support; and it is left, as was that most excellent and just enactment, "The Prisoners' Counsel Act," to the efforts of a private individual to remove from our criminal code a blot of the most unseeming description. This passiveness is a remarkable instance of the indifference with which we are habituated to look upon abuses which have been sanctioned by a long existence; and it forcibly exhibits the tendency amongst men in authority to recognize and tolerate an evil when it does not press severely upon themselves rather than to bestir themselves for its removal. However, thanks to the well-directed efforts of one enlightened and active mind, the abuse and evil to which we have adverted is likely soon to be extinguished for ever, and our criminal code will be thereby purged of a feature of the most reproachful description.

Entertaining, as we do, the highest opinion of Mr. Kelly's Bill, we have taken the pains to go through it with more than ordinary attention. We desire to see the effects of this learned gentleman crowned with the most complete success, and therefore it is that we beg to call his attention, and that of the Profession at large, to the amendments which a careful perusal of the intended enactment has suggested to our minds as desirable and necessary. In order to give a clear statement of our views, we will take the sections of the intended Act in their proper order, and in doing this, we beg to refer the reader to the Bill itself, as printed in the number of this Journal of the 14th September.

The first clause states, in general terms, that any defendant who may be found guilty may apply, by way of appeal, to any one of the three common law courts, which courts are empowered to order that the verdict of guilty, and all subsequent proceedings thereupon had, shall be set aside; and that a new trial shall be had, or that a verdict of not guilty shall be entered in lieu thereof, and of judgment thereupon, or that the judgment shall be arrested. It is to be feared that this clause leaves the question of appeal in too loose a manner, and that it is scarcely sufficiently explanatory of its intention. It may well be inquired upon what materials is the motion of appeal to be made? Is the defendant to be at liberty to make an affidavit? If so, some provision should be made to facilitate his so doing, since, after a prisoner's conviction he becomes subject to all the usual rules appertaining to his new position, amongst others, to seclusion from his friends, legal advisers, &c. It may also be asked on what grounds are the courts to act in granting a new trial? Is surprise at the trial to be one, or the discovering of additional evidence, or, indeed, any of those reasons which in civil actions induce the Court to direct a new trial on payment of costs? Is the Court, in fact, to be at liberty to exercise a general discretion upon the subject, and in any case, to make a payment of costs by the prisoner a condition?

The second clause provides for the time when the appeal motion shall be made. We would here suggest that, inasmuch as a conviction for crime involves consequences to an accused family of no trifling magnitude, they should be allowed to prosecute the appeal at their own instance if the prisoner himself declines.

The third section provides for due obedience to all rules and orders of the superior courts.

The fourth section shews the mode in which the rules nisi and absolute are to be drawn up and served; and here it would have been as well if power had been given to the judges to draw up a body of rules for the purpose of regulating the practice upon the subject, since, notwithstanding the clause in question, much practical detail must be resorted to, for which the clause does not provide, in order to carry out its objects efficiently, particularly with respect to the Court of Common Pleas, in which there is no regular Crown officer. It would be wise, also, to provide that the clerk of the peace shall in every case be served (by post) with a copy of all rules.

The fifth section is a most important one; it enacts that "where any order for a new trial shall be made the Court shall order when such new trial shall take place, and that such trial shall be had in like manner as though no former trial had been had; that the Court, taking the second trial, shall have the same powers as the Court on the former trial; that where the superior Court shall order a verdict of 'Not Guilty' to be entered, or the judgment to be arrested or reversed, the gaoler shall, upon service of the office copy of the rule, discharge the defendant out of custody," &c. It is not a little singular, that no provision should have been made for opposing the making of the defendant's rule absolute. It is evidently intended, and it certainly is desirable, that the prosecutor, or some party on behalf of the Crown, should be permitted to shew cause; complete justice cannot be effected unless this be done; indeed, the fourth section provides for the service of the rule nisi upon the prosecutor or his attorney, evidently with the view of cause being shewn against the rule if necessary, but no provision is made in any clause in the Bill for the prosecutor's costs in opposing the rule: surely this must be altered. Under any circumstances, a prosecutor who has no personal end in view will be sufficiently loath to enter into a contest in the court above; but if he is to be saddled with costs in so doing he never will oppose at all; and thus imperfect justice will be done in the case. This must be remedied; costs of opposing the rule must be allowed; the officer of the court should tax them, and give a certificate for the amount to be paid on production to the county or borough treasurer out of the county or borough fund; and perhaps it would redound to the honour of the law if the judges were to be invested with a discretion to direct the defendant's costs to be paid in a similar way where their decision is in his favour. Some provision also is required in this clause for the purpose of getting the witnesses again together at the second trial; they should be bound over again: perhaps the easiest mode of doing this would be for the prosecutor or his attorney to apply to the nearest justice, who, upon reading the rule for the new trial, should issue his summons commanding the various witnesses to attend to enter into fresh recognizances; the said justice to give a certificate of expenses. Power, also, should be given to the Court to change the venue.

The sixth section provides for the carrying out of the sentence pronounced, in the event of the Court above refusing the rule nisi, or discharging it. It would be as well if the clause were to be a little more specific as to the time when the regular punishment is to commence. Suppose a party is sentenced to three months' imprisonment, and, in consequence of its being intimated that an appeal will be made, the Court directs the sentence to be suspended until after the determination of the appeal (which by the seventh section it may do), and the rule is refused, or ultimately discharged, from what exact time is the imprisonment under the sentence to commence? From the day of the service of the rule, or when, and how if the party be at large? This may easily be provided for, and it certainly should be.

The seventh section provides "that it shall be lawful for any Court before whom any indictment for any felony or misdemeanor shall be tried, to reserve any question of law which shall arise for the consideration of such one of the said Courts at Westminster, and it shall be lawful for the said Courts at Westminster in every case, whether upon motion or by writ of error, or on any question of law reserved by rule, to order a verdict of not guilty, &c. or to make such other order and give such other judgment as upon the whole matter shall appear to such Court to be right and just." In carrying this clause into effect, considerable difficulty will arise in cases where the defendant has been tried before a Court of Quarter Sessions, or other limited jurisdiction, from the notes of the trial not being before the court above. When tried at the assizes, the court above will have the judges' notes to refer to; but how will this be managed when the trial has been at the sessions? Some method must be devised for getting the notes of the evidence, or a transcript of them into court; how else can the Court judge of the propriety of a new trial. Perhaps the same method could be adopted which now exists in relation to the trial of issues under 20*l.* before the sheriff; a verified copy could be obtained; but as the sheriff or his undersheriff is a functionary always to be found at a fixed place, and a chairman or recorder at sessions may be any where, it would be as well to provide that these latter shall, at the end of each sessions, deposit their notes of the evidence with the clerk of the peace, who shall be authorised to give a verified copy (verified by his seal) to either the prosecutor or the defendant at a fixed charge. It is to be presumed that, after this Bill shall have become the law of the land, the old method of reserving a point at the assizes for the consideration of all the judges will no longer be adopted.

The eighth section directs the course to be adopted by the Court below when an appeal has been made: and it enacts that if any defendant who has been found guilty shall, by himself or his counsel or attorney, before sentence is pronounced, declare his intention of appealing or bringing a writ of error, or if the Court shall reserve any point of law, it may in its discretion either pronounce a sentence to be carried into execution after the determination of the appeal, &c. or postpone the pronouncing of a sentence until after the appeal, or to pronounce a sentence to be carried into execution notwithstanding the appeal, &c.; and in case of the postponement of the sentence or postponement of its execution, it may either order the defendant to be detained in custody until the determination of the appeal, &c. or to be discharged out of custody upon entering into recognizances, &c.; and where the Court shall have postponed sentence, and the verdict shall be affirmed, the Court above may pronounce sentence, which sentence shall be inserted in the rule of Court and be carried into effect, &c. &c. The provision in this clause relative to the admission to bail pending on appeal, a writ of error, &c. is wholesome and just. The authority given to the Court above of passing sentence cannot, however, be effectually exercised unless the evidence taken on the trial be brought before them. Some method, therefore, for this reason, also, must be adopted to get a transcript of the evidence brought up.

The ninth section provides for the passing of sentence on the defendant in the event of sentence having originally been postponed. and not passed even by the Court above; and the section gives the Court where the party was tried power to pronounce sentence at some sessions of the Court after the decision of the Court above shall have been pronounced against the defendant. To carry this clause effectively out, some provision should be made for having the notes of the trial before the Court at the time the defendant is to be sentenced; it will not do to rely upon the memory of the judge, and indeed it would but rarely occur that he would be the same who presided at the former trial; it would never do to pass sentence in ignorance of the facts of the case. The clerk of the peace, therefore, upon whom it would be well that a copy of all rules under this Act should be served, should be directed to have the notes of the evidence in court at the time they might be required. In relation to the power of the Court to order the sentence to be carried into effect notwithstanding the appeal, an exception ought to be made to this power in the cases of capital offences; it would be a little strange to give a man a power of appealing, and kill him in the mean time. Still, there is some difficulty about this matter; the power to appeal is given generally, and upon the defendant's declaring his intention at the trial, the judge has power to stay the execution of the sentence. Now if in capital cases the sentence is nevertheless to be carried into effect, the power of appeal is useless; and if it is to be stayed on the defendant's declaring his intention to appeal, he will declare such his intention in every case, and thus in every case of a conviction for murder, the sentence will for a period, and in many cases a very long period, be suspended. This is a very serious difficulty, and we do not well see a way out of it.

The tenth section provides for the tendering, in criminal cases, of bills of exceptions, and for the suing out of writs of error. This section, like the others, is silent as to the prosecutor's costs; surely some provision should be inserted upon the subject.

The eleventh section empowers the Court above to grant a new trial, even where the verdict has been that of not guilty, in cases of indictments for the non-repair, obstruction, or damage of or to any highway or bridge, or for any nuisance. This exception to the old rule of the criminal law, that a party shall not, after being acquitted, be again tried for the same offence, is well introduced, since indictments for the above offences either do not involve individual liability, or are brought for the purpose of trying some right; in either of which cases the objection to a second trial has little or no weight.

The twelfth section enacts that it shall not be necessary for any defendant to be present before any of the courts at Westminster at the hearing of the appeal, &c. nor at the pronouncing of judgment. No provision is made for the event of a defendant desiring to make his own motion; in such a case he ought to be at liberty to sue out a habeas corpus.

The thirteenth section opens the Court of Common Pleas for the purposes of this Act to the entire bar. It will, no doubt, shortly be found convenient to establish an additional superior court for the purpose of taking cognizance, not only of the appeals, &c. under this Act, but the entire branch of Crown business now appertaining to the Queen's Bench. Such a Court even at present, from the vast increase of Crown rules of late years, is much wanted; and, with the addition which this enactment will make to the Crown practice, it will be indispensable.

The fourteenth section provides for the production of a copy of any indictment when the same shall be necessary for the purposes of the appeal, &c.

The fifteenth section enacts "that in all cases of prosecution for any crime, a copy of the indictment shall be delivered either before or after sentence to the defendant upon application on payment of a reasonable sum for the same, and that such copy shall be signed and certified to be a true copy by the clerk of assize or such other officer having the custody thereof, and every such copy purporting to be signed and certified as aforesaid, shall be deemed and taken for all intents and purposes whatsoever, to be as good and effectual as the indictment itself, &c.; and any clerk of assize, &c. certifying any such copy as a true and authentic copy, knowing the same to be false in any material part, and any person counterfeiting the signature of such clerk, &c. for the purpose of counterfeiting a copy of such indictment, &c., or who shall utter any such false copy knowing the same to be false, &c. shall be guilty of felony, and being duly convicted, shall be liable to be transported beyond the seas for life or for any term not less than seven years, or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding four years." This clause will be found highly convenient in practice, and the penalty annexed to wilful fraud will be amply sufficient to deter parties from designedly falsifying any of the records referred to. The section, however, scarcely goes far enough to ensure that accuracy in transcription so necessary in such a case. The most important results to a party may be the consequence of an erroneous transcript of a single word; some check, therefore, should be placed upon carelessness, since errors are more likely to arise from this source than from any other, and it would be wise, therefore, to impose a pecuniary penalty for any error or inaccuracy in any material part, &c.

The sixteenth section provides for the removal of an indictment found at the sessions to the assizes, and for a trial by a special jury; a clause which appears to be judicious, subject to this observation, that inasmuch as a party arraigned for felony has a right peremptorily to challenge twenty jurors (which has been the reason why hitherto special juries have not been allowed in felonies, Rex v. Macartney (Vin. ab. tit. Trial, D. a, 2 pl. 5); see also the judgment of Coltman, J. in Gray v. The Queen), this difficulty must be met, or a special jury, when obtained by the prosecutor, will be a nullity.

The seventeenth section, after reciting the inconvenience, expense, and delay attending the removing of indictments and records by writs of certiorari and error for the purpose of objecting to their sufficiency, enacts that it shall be lawful for a prosecutor or defendant in any case of felony or misdemeanour, to apply to the courts above upon production of such certified copy as aforesaid, to quash such indictment or reverse the judgment, and that the judgment pronounced on such certified copy shall be of the same force as if pronounced on the indictment itself on a writ of error. This is a sensible provision, but we fear that unless strict accuracy in transcribing be insured by a pecuniary penalty that it will not answer the purpose intended, particularly when it is remembered that the certified copy will chiefly be required to illustrate the errors, omissions, and inaccuracies of the original record; defects, indeed, which the transcriber will be but too ready to supply, and this, too, from no wrongful intention, but from a long practice of drawing legal forms correctly himself. Unless, indeed, even accidental and unintentional inaccuracy be visited with a penalty, we much fear that a certified copy of an indictment will not receive the confidence of the profession.

Two or three subsequent sections being the interpretation and construction clauses, &c. conclude the Act.

We have been thus critical with the view of improving and perfecting an Act which we feel assured will be of the greatest importance. Many of the suggestions we have thought it right to make, we conceive to be indispensable to the due working of the measure, and we trust that they will receive attention at the hands of those who have the power to exercise an influence over its fate. Before leaving the subject we would suggest the propriety of the introduction of a clause requiring the party having the legal custody of depositions to give copies of the same to the prosecutor or his attorney on the payment of a reasonable amount per folio. The 6 & 7 Wm. 4, c. 114, which by s. 3 gave defendants a right to copies of the examinations of witnesses on payment of a sum not exceeding three halfpence a folio of ninety words, does not apply to prosecutors; and the result is, that clerks to magistrates are sometimes in the habit of charging most exorbitantly for these copies. In one case we remember twelve and sixpence being charged for depositions occupying only two sides of foolscap, the answer given to the remonstrance at such a charge being that there were five witnesses; and that it was a rule to charge half-a-crown for each witness! A clause making it imperative on the proper parties to deliver copies of the examinations at a small fixed sum will be a useful and convenient addition to this excellent Act, which we trust ere another session elapses, will become a part and parcel of the law of the land.

NEW STATUTES.

Of the Session 8 Victoria.

Cap. LXXXIV.

An Act for regulating the Construction and the Use of Buildings in the Metropolis and its Neighbourhood. (August 9, 1844.)

This is a very important Act to the inhabitants of the metropolis and its environs, but not of sufficient general interest, and too technical in its details, to be printed at length. We shall therefore give only a brief abstract of its provisions, and the sections which affect building agreements, leases, &c.

Sec. 1 enacts that the Act shall come into operation, as to the districts and the officers to be appointed in pursuance thereof, on the first day of September next, and as to the buildings, streets, and other matters, on the first day of January, one thousand eight hundred and forty-five, and that on the said first day of January all the Acts mentioned in the Schedule (A) thereunto annexed, except so far as in the said schedule is provided, shall be and are thereby repealed.

Sec. 2 defines the terms used in the Act.

Sec. 3. Extent of operation of the Act in reference to localities.—And be it enacted, That the operation of this Act shall extend to all places within the following limits (that is to say): to all such places lying on the north side or left bank of the river Thames as are within the exterior boundaries of the parishes of Fulham, Hammersmith, Kensington, Paddington, Hampstead, Hornsey, Tottenham, Saint Pancras, Islington, Stoke Newington, Hackney, Stratford-le-Bow, Bromley, Poplar, and Shadwell; and to such part of the parish of Chelsea as lies north of the said parish of Kensington; and to all such parts and places lying on the south side or right bank of the said river as are within the exterior boundaries of the parishes of Woolwich, Charlton, Greenwich, Deptford, Lee, Lewisham, Camberwell, Lambeth, Streatham, Tooting, and Wandsworth; and to all places lying within 200 yards from the exterior boundary of the district hereby defined, except the eastern part of the said boundary which is bounded by the river Lea.

Sec. 4 gives power to the Queen in Council to extend the limits of the Act to any place within twelve miles of Charing Cross, after due notice in the Gazette.

Sections 5—8 relate to the regulation of buildings.

Sec. 9. Modification of building contracts.—Provided always and be it enacted, with regard to any building of whatever class, so far as relates to the modification of any written contract or agreement now in force for erecting or altering such building (other than a contract or agreement in the nature of a building lease), That it shall not be lawful to execute such contract otherwise than in conformity with the provisions of this Act, but it shall be lawful for either party and he is hereby entitled to deviate from such contract so far as any part thereof may remain to be executed after this Act shall have come into operation, and the alterations rendered necessary by this Act shall be performed as if this Act had been in force when such contract was entered into; and that if the parties thereto shall disagree about the difference of the costs and expenses of the works when performed according to the provisions of this Act, and the works as stipulated for in such contract, then, upon notice being given in writing by one party to the other, it shall be lawful for either party, and he is hereby entitled, to refer the matter to the surveyor, who shall determine the same, subject to appeal as aforesaid to the official referees, and the award of such official referees shall be final and binding on all the parties, and in all respects, as if such award had formed part of the contract, and the costs of the reference shall be borne by all or any or either of the parties, in such manner and proportion as the surveyor, or, in case of appeal, as the official referees shall appoint.

Sec. 10. Modification of building leases.—Provided always and be it enacted, with regard to any building of whatever class so far as relates to the modification of any existing lease or agreement for a lease, being of the nature of a building lease, whereby any person may be bound to erect buildings, That, notwithstanding any thing herein contained, if it be made to appear to the official referees that any rules by this Act prescribed will prevent the due observance of or be at variance with any such lease or agreement, and that the objects of this Act may be obtained by modifying such rules either entirely or partially in conformity with such lease or agreement, then it shall be lawful for the said official referees by their award to authorize such modification, subject nevertheless to the approbation of the Commissioners of Works and

Buildings, and subject to such modification, or, in default thereof, it shall be the duty of such person so bound to erect buildings, and he is hereby required, to erect every building agreed to be built by such lease or agreement according to the conditions rendered necessary by this Act, in the same or like manner as if this Act had been passed and in operation at the time of making such lease or agreement.

The section goes on to enact that the lessee or tenant may apply to the official referees to assess the amount of compensation he may be entitled to, and that their decision shall be final.

Secs. 11, 12 empower the commissioners to modify the provisions of the Act in certain cases.

CAP. LXXXV.

An Act to attach certain Conditions to the Construction of future Railways authorized or to be authorized by any Act of the present or succeeding Sessions of Parliament; and for other purposes in relation to Railways. (August 9, 1844.)

It will be unnecessary to reprint this statute entire. An abstract of its provisions will be sufficient, as it has no particular legal interest.

Sec. 1 provides that if, after twenty-one years from the passing of the Act for the construction of any future railway, the profits shall exceed 10*l.* per cent. the Treasury may revise the scale of tolls and fix a new scale, and that it shall not be again revised for twenty-one years thereafter.

Sec. 2 gives to Government the option of purchasing such railways at twenty-five years' purchase estimated at the annual profits for three years preceding.

But sec. 3 enacts that existing railways shall not be subjected to the options; and sec. 4 reserves to Parliament the power of considering its future policy in regard to the said options.

Sec. 5 enacts that railway companies are to keep accounts, which are to be open to inspection by the Government.

Sec. 6 is sufficiently important to be given entire:—

Companies to provide one cheap train each way daily.—And whereas it is expedient to secure to the poorer class of travellers the means of travelling by railway at moderate fares, and in carriages in which they may be protected from the weather; be it enacted, That on and after the several days hereinafter specified all passenger railway companies which shall have been incorporated by any Act of the present session, or which shall be hereafter incorporated, or which by any Act of the present or any future session have obtained or shall obtain, directly or indirectly, any extension or amendment of the powers conferred on them respectively by their previous Acts, or have been or shall be authorized to do any Act unauthorized by the provisions of such previous Acts, shall, by means of one train at the least to travel along their railway from one end to the other of each trunk, branch, or junction line belonging to or leased by them, so long as they shall continue to carry other passengers over such trunk, branch, or junction line, once at the least each way on every week-day, except Christmas-day and Good Friday (such exception not to extend to Scotland), provide for the conveyance of third-class passengers to and from the terminal and other ordinary passenger stations of the railway, under the obligations contained in their several Acts of Parliament, and with the immunities applicable by law to carriers of passengers by railway; and also under the following conditions (that is to say):—

Such train shall start at an hour to be from time to time fixed by the directors, subject to the approval of the Lords of the Committee of Privy Council for Trade and Plantations:

Such train shall travel at an average rate of speed not less than twelve miles an hour for the whole distance travelled on the railway, including stoppages:

Such train shall, if required, take up and set down passengers at every passenger station which it shall pass on the line:

The carriages in which passengers shall be conveyed by such train shall be provided with seats, and shall be protected from the weather, in a manner satisfactory to the Lords of the said committee:

The fare or charge for each third-class passenger by such train shall not exceed one penny for each mile travelled:

Each passenger by such train shall be allowed to take with him half a hundred weight of luggage, not being merchandize or other articles carried for hire or profit, without extra charge; and any excess of luggage shall be charged by weight, at a rate not exceeding the lowest rate of charge for passengers' luggage by other trains:

Children under three years of age accompanying passengers by such train shall be taken without any charge, and children of three years and upwards, but under twelve years of age, at half the charge for an adult passenger:

And with respect to all railways subject to these obligations which shall be open on or before the first day of November next, these obligations shall come into force on the said first day of November; and with respect to all other railways subject to these obligations, they shall come into force on the day of opening of the railway, or the day after the last day of the session in which the Act shall be passed by reason of which the company will become subject thereunto, which shall first happen.

Sec. 7 imposes a penalty of 20*l.* per day for non-compliance with this regulation.

Sec. 8 gives to the Board of Trade a discretionary power of allowing alternative arrangements.

Sec. 9 exempts cheap trains from taxation.

Sec. 10 enacts that where companies run trains on the Sunday, cheap trains are likewise to be provided.

Sec. 11 requires railway companies to provide certain additional facilities for the transmission of the mails; and by sec. 12 they are to convey military and police forces at certain charges.

Sec. 13 requires companies to allow lines of electrical telegraph to be established, and by sec. 14, those established by private parties are to be open to the public.

Sec. 15 enacts that the Board of Trade shall appoint inspectors of railways.

Sec. 16 repeals the provisions of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 97, and in lieu thereof, it is enacted by sec. 17 that if railway companies contravene or exceed the provisions of their Acts, or of any general Acts, the Board of Trade is to certify the same to the Attorney-General, who shall proceed against them; but by sec. 18, the company is to have twenty-one days' notice, and prosecutions are to be under the sanction of the Board of Trade and within one year after the offence.

Sec. 19 prohibits the issue of loan notes and other illegal securities, but permits loan notes already issued to be renewed, and sec. 20 empowers those already due to be paid; but by sec. 21, the companies are to make a register of all such loan notes or other securities.

Sec. 22 we copy entire, as it is of legal interest:—

Remedy for recovery of tithe rent charged on railway land.—And whereas the remedies now in force for the recovery of tithe commutation rent-charges are in many instances ineffectual for such parts thereof as are charged upon lands taken for the purposes of a railway, and it is therefore expedient to extend the said remedies when the said rent-charges may have been duly apportioned; be it enacted, That in all cases in which any such rent-charge, or part of any rent-charge, has been or hereafter shall be duly apportioned under the provisions of the Acts for the Commutation of Tithes in England and Wales, upon lands taken or purchased by any railway company for the purposes of such company, or upon any part of such lands, it shall be lawful for every person entitled to the said rent-charge or parts of such rent-charge, in case the same has been or shall be in arrear and unpaid for the space of twenty-one days next after any half-yearly day fixed for the payment thereof, to distrain for all arrears of the said rent-charge upon the goods, chattels, and effects of the said company, whether on the land charged therewith, or any other lands, premises, or hereditaments of such company, whether situated in the same parish or elsewhere, and to dispose of the distress when taken, and otherwise to demean himself in relation thereto, as any landlord may for arrears of rent reserved on a lease for years: provided always, that nothing herein contained shall give or be construed to give a legal right to such rent-charge, when but for this Act such rent-charge was not or could not be duly apportioned.

Sec. 23 provides for communication to and from the Board of Trade, service of notices, &c. and secs. 24 & 25 for the application of penalties and the interpretation of the Act.

CAP. LXXXVI.

An Act for the Relief of Clerks to Attorneys and Solicitors who have omitted to enrol their Contracts; and for amending the Law relating to the Enrolment of such Contracts, and to the Disabilities of such Clerks, in certain Cases. (August 9, 1844.)

34 Geo. 3, c. 14; 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73. Indemnity to clerks who have neglected to enrol their contracts.—Whereas, by an Act passed in the thirty-fourth year of the reign of his late Majesty King George the Third, intituled "An Act for granting to his Majesty certain Stamp Duties on Indentures of Clerkships to Solicitors and Attorneys in any of the Courts in England therein mentioned," it is enacted, that no person who by any contract in writing made after the days in the said Act respectively mentioned shall become bound to serve as a clerk in order to his admission as a solicitor or an attorney in any of the Courts therein mentioned shall be admitted to be a solicitor or attorney in any of the said courts, unless the indenture or other writing containing such contract, duly stamped, shall be enrolled or registered with the proper officer to be appointed for that purpose in the court wherein such person shall propose to be afterwards admitted a solicitor or attorney by virtue of his service under such contract, together with an affidavit of the time of the execution of such contract by such clerk; and in case such indenture or other writing shall not be enrolled or registered in such court within six months next after the execution thereof, together with such affidavit, that then and in such case the service of such clerk under such indenture or writing shall be deemed to commence from the time of such enrolment or registry, and not from the execution of such indenture or writing: And whereas by an Act passed in the sixth and seventh years of the reign of her present Majesty, intituled "An Act for consolidating and amending several of the Laws relating to Attorneys and Solicitors practising in England and Wales," it is enacted, that whenever any person shall, after the passing of the said last-mentioned Act be bound by contract in writing to serve as a clerk to any attorney or solicitor, as therein mentioned, such attorney or solicitor shall, within six months after the date of every such contract make and swear, or cause to be made and sworn, an affidavit of such attorney or solicitor having been duly admitted, and also of the actual execution of every such contract, and containing such particulars as are therein mentioned; and that every such affidavit shall be filed within six months next after the execution of the said contract with the officer therein mentioned, who shall thereupon enrol and register the said contract, and shall make and sign a memorandum of the day of filing such affidavit upon such affidavit, and also upon such contract; and it is thereby provided, that in case such last-mentioned affidavit be not filed within such six months, the same may be filed after the expiration thereof, but that the service of such clerk shall be reckoned to commence and be computed from the day of filing such affidavit, unless one of the courts of law or equity shall otherwise order: And whereas many persons who may have paid the proper stamp duties either before or within six months after the execution of the contracts in writing entered into by them for the purposes aforesaid have omitted to cause affidavits to be made, and afterwards to be filed in the proper office, of the execution of such contracts, as required by the said first-mentioned Act, and have also omitted to cause such contracts, and the indentures thereof, or the assignment of any such indentures, to be enrolled within the time in which the same ought to have been done, whereby they have incurred certain disabilities; for preventing whereof, and relieving such persons, be it enacted by the Queen's most excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, That every person who shall, either before or within six months after the execution of such contract or indenture, have paid the proper stamp duty in that behalf, and who at the time of the passing of this Act shall have neglected or omitted, or who may, within six months after the execution of any such contract or indenture executed before the passing of this Act, neglect or omit to cause any such affidavit or affidavits, as required by the said first-mentioned Act as aforesaid, to be made and filed, or such contract, or indenture, or assignment to be enrolled, and who on or before the first day of Hilary Term next shall cause such contract, or indenture, or assignment to be enrolled with the proper officer in that behalf, and one or more affidavit or affidavits, as required by the said first-mentioned Act, to be made, and afterwards to be filed, in such manner as the same ought to have been made and filed in due time, shall be and is hereby indemnified, freed, and discharged from and against all incapacities and disabilities in or by any Act or Acts mentioned by reason of such neglect or omission; and every such affidavit and affidavits so to be made, and which shall be duly filed on or before the said first day of Hilary Term next, shall be as effectual to all intents and purposes as if the same had been made and filed within the respective times the same ought by the laws now in being for that purpose to have been made and filed.

2. Where persons neglect to enrol their contracts within the time allowed, the Court may order the service to commence from the execution.—And whereas certain persons who have become bound by contracts as aforesaid, executed before the passing of this Act, may have enrolled the same after the expiration of six months from the date thereof, or may omit to enrol the same within the time hereby provided; be it enacted, That it shall be lawful for any of her Majesty's superior courts of law or equity at Westminster, in any case where any such contract executed before the passing of this Act shall not have been enrolled within the six months from the date thereof, or shall not be enrolled within the time by this Act allowed, to order and direct, either before or after the contract shall in any such case have been enrolled, with the proper affidavit by law required, that the service under such contract shall be reckoned to commence and be computed from the execution of such contract, or from any subsequent period prior to such enrolment, as such Court may think fit; and the same shall be deemed to have so commenced accordingly, whether such person shall at any time afterwards apply to be admitted in the same or any other court, any thing in the said first-mentioned Act, or any other Act to the contrary notwithstanding.

3. Provisions of 34 Geo. 3, c. 14, as to the enrolment of contracts repealed.—And whereas since the passing of the said Act of the sixth and seventh years of her present Majesty's reign the aforesaid provisions of the said Act of the thirty fourth year of the reign of King George the Third have become unnecessary, and it is expedient that the same should be repealed; be it therefore enacted, That so much of the said last-mentioned Act as relates to the enrolment and registering of indentures and other writings containing any contract whereby any person shall become bound to serve as a clerk in order to his admission as a solicitor or attorney in any of the courts in the said Act mentioned, together with such affidavit as aforesaid, shall, in respect of all such indentures or writings made or executed after the passing of this Act be and the same is hereby repealed: provided always, that nothing herein contained shall be deemed or construed to repeal or alter any of the provisions of the said Act of the sixth and seventh years of the reign of her present Majesty.

4. Neglect of attorneys, &c. in taking out their annual certificates not to disqualify their clerks.—And whereas many attorneys, solicitors, notaries public, and others may have omitted or may hereafter omit to take out annual certificates, or to enter or register the same in the proper office, and persons who may have served as clerks to such attorneys, solicitors, notaries public, and others, may by reason of such omission have incurred or may hereafter incur certain disabilities; for preventing whereof be it enacted, That no person who now has or hereafter shall have regularly served any attorney or attorneys, notary public or notaries public, for the term of years required by law, shall be prevented or disqualified from being admitted an attorney, solicitor, or notary public, by reason of any omission of the person or persons whom he served for the same term or any part thereof having neglected or omitted to take out his annual certificate, or to enter or register the same; provided such person so having served is otherwise entitled to be so admitted as aforesaid by the laws for the time being in force relating thereto.

5. Act may be altered this session.—And be it enacted, That this Act may be amended or repealed by any Act to be passed in the present session of Parliament.

Cap. LXXXVII.

An Act to amend the Law for regulating Places kept for slaughtering Horses. (August 9, 1844.)

We give this statute entire :—

New licences to be annual.—Whereas by an Act passed in the twenty-sixth year of the reign of his Majesty King George the Third, and also by an Act passed in the sixth year of the reign of his late Majesty King William the Fourth, provision was made for the regulation and inspection of houses and places kept for the purpose of slaughtering horses; and whereas it is expedient to make further provision for the better and more effectual regulation and inspection of such houses and places; be it therefore enacted by the Queen's most excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, That every licence which shall after the passing of this Act be granted under or by virtue of the said Act of the twenty-sixth year of King George the Third, authorizing any person to keep or use any house or place for the purpose of slaughtering or killing any horse or other cattle (not killed for butchers' meat), shall be granted, and shall continue in force, for a period not exceeding one year from the date at which the same was granted, determinable as hereinafter provided: provided nevertheless, that in the case of the renewal of any such licence to any person to whom any such licence may have been previously granted as aforesaid it shall not be necessary for such person to obtain or produce to the justices at such general quarter sessions of the peace a certificate under the hands and seals of the minister, churchwardens, overseers, or householders, as required by the said last-mentioned Act.

2. Justices in quarter sessions may cancel licences.—And be it enacted, That it shall be lawful for the justices assembled at any general quarter sessions of the peace to be holden for any county, upon application and complaint made to them in writing by any person, and upon due proof being made to them that the party so complaining had given fourteen days' previous notice in writing thereof to the clerk of the peace for such county, and also to the party complained against, and upon due proof to their satisfaction that any person so licensed as aforesaid has been guilty of any breach or violation of the said two several hereinbefore recited Acts or either of them, or of this Act, or any part or parts thereof respectively, to cancel and wholly put an end to any and every licence which may have been granted to the person or persons so complained against, and from thenceforth the same shall be of no force or effect.

3. Persons wantonly or cruelly ill-treating any horse to be liable to penalty.—And be it enacted, That if any such licensed or other person shall wantonly or cruelly beat, ill-treat, abuse, wound, or torture any horse or other cattle in any house, pound, stable, or other place in the occupation or use of such licensed person, every such person shall for every such offence, on conviction thereof, forfeit and pay a sum of money not exceeding five pounds.

4. Power for constables to enter licensed places.—And be it enacted, That it shall be lawful for any constable from time to time, and as often as he shall think fit, at all reasonable times in the daytime, by authority of this Act, either alone or accompanied by any inspector appointed or to be appointed under the first-recited Act, to enter upon and view and inspect all and every the houses, stables, sheds, yards, grounds, and premises for the keeping of which any such licence shall have been granted as aforesaid, and also to inspect or take an account of all or any of the horses or other cattle which shall from time to time be found upon such premises or any part thereof.

5. Penalty for obstructing inspectors.—And be it enacted, That in case any person to whom any such licence shall be granted as aforesaid, or any other person, shall at any time or in any manner obstruct, hinder, molest, or assault any such inspector whilst in the discharge of his duty, or the exercise of his power or authority under or by virtue of the said first-recited Act or of this Act, every such offender shall for every such offence, on conviction thereof, forfeit and pay such a sum of money, not exceeding ten pounds, as any two or more justices before whom such offender shall be brought shall deem fit.

6. Penalty for inspector neglecting his duty.—And be it enacted, That in case any such inspector shall at any time be guilty of any neglect or violation of the duty required of him by law, then and in every such case such inspector shall, upon conviction, forfeit and pay for every such offence a sum of money not exceeding ten pounds.

7. *Offences may be heard by two justices. PARLIAMENTARY RETURNS.

Smuggling and Frauds on the Customs in 1842, 1843.—It appears from a return dated May 9, 1844 (Parl. Pap. No. 293), that the number of prosecutions for smuggling and frauds in the customs instituted in England in 1842 was 815, and in 1843, 1,147. The expenses incurred in the respective years were 3,254l. 15s. and 5,599l. 15s. 7d. and the amount received in duties, 52l. 10s. 2d. and 267l. 10s. 6d.; in penalties, 1,782l. 7s. 1d. and 943l. 12s. 9d.; in compromises, 694l. 19s. 4d. and 2,533l. 16s. 4d. In Ireland, the number of prosecutions was 86 and 206; the expenses were 564l. 17s. 6d. and 583l. 9s. 9d.; the amount of duties received, 673l. 3s. 1d. and nil.; of penalties, 17l. 10s. and 24l.; compromises, 677l. 15s. and 393l. 11s. 9d.: thus shewing the somewhat singular result of a profit being made of 604l. 6s. 7d. in 1842, by these prosecutions. In Scotland, the prosecutions in the respective years amounted to 64 and 107, the expenses to 94l. 18s. 7d. and 89l. 12s.; the sums received in duties, 16l. 3s. 11d. and 9l. 9s 9d.; in penalties, 130l. 4s. 6d. and 33l. 13s. 6d.; in compromises, 251l. 4s. 6d. and 414l. 2s. 3d. The sum of 12,000l. has been recovered from Charles Candy and William Dean, and paid into court to abide the result of writs of error brought by them. Verdicts have also been found for the Crown against Charles Candy, for the further sum of 3,150l. against William Dean for 1,050l. and against Denis John Blake, late a landing-waiter in the Customs, for 4,350l. which also await the result of writs of error. The sum of 3,954l. 1s. 4d. has also been obtained from Messrs. Candy and Dean, under an extent, for duties alleged to be due from them to the Crown, and has also been paid into Court to abide the decision of a jury as to the amount which may be found to be due; and a verdict has been found for the Crown against John Dean for 137l. 6s. as duty due from him.

Savings' Banks.—A bulky Parliamentary paper, weighing nearly twelve ounces, containing an account of the number of depositors in savings' banks, and of charitable institutions and friendly societies, and of the sums deposited in savings' banks, divided into classes on the 20th day of November, 1843, &c. has been issued on the motion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. We subjoin the following statistical information:—On the 20th of November, 1843 (the period at which the financial year of savings' banks usually terminates) the gross total number of depositors in savings' banks and other charitable institutions, throughout the United Kingdom, amounted to 935,350, and the gross sum total of their deposits, including interest, to 27,177,215l. of which sum 25,425,067l. was deposited in savings' banks exclusively. There were 523,980 depositors in savings' banks of sums not exceeding 20l. making a gross total amount of 3,398,367l.; 237,989 depositors of sums not exceeding 50l. (7,335,412l.); 98,146 depositors not exceeding 100l. (6,754,330l.); 33,483 depositors not exceeding 150l. (4,026,463l.); 18,877 depositors not exceeding 200l (3,215,422l.); and 2,917 of sums exceeding 200l. making in all 695,073l. The average amount deposited by each person will be found to be about the sum of 29l. and a fraction. The total sums of money received from the trustees of savings' banks, including friendly societies, from August 6, 1817, to Nov. 20, 1843, amount to 30,833,239l. the total amount due to the said trustees on the 20th of November last, being 28,853,535l. and the value of the Government securities standing in the names of the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt, at the same period, being 28,561,164l.; being an uninvested balance of 296,609l. The Commissioners seem to invest liberally in all the Government securities which constitute what is called the "Funded Debt." The difference between the amount paid by the public for interest and charges on the sums due to the trustees of savings' banks, &c. up to and due on the 20th of November, 1843, and the amount received from dividends on stock or other public securities in which the said sums have been invested by the Commissioners up to the 10th of October, 1843, is 2,171,192l. the former amounting to 15,113,849l. and the latter to 12,942,657l. The gross amount of the "separate surplus fund," standing to the credit of the trustees of savings' banks in the United Kingdom on the said 20th of November, 1843, was 305,723l. The gross total amount of the annuities granted by certain savings' banks and parochial societies, under the Act 3 Wm. 4, c. 14, up to the 5th of April last, was 40,593l. for which the sum of 430,889l. was paid. The total sums paid in 1843-44 for the purchase of stock and Exchequer bills on account of the fund for savings' banks in England amounts to 1,411,450l. No stock appears to have been sold either in 1843 or 1844. It further appears, that the total stock created by the funding of Exchequer bills on account of the fund for savings' banks in England, from October 1836 up to April 1844, amounts to 7,627,384l. of which 5,139,572l. was created in the Three per Cent. Consols, and 2,487,812l. in the Three per Cent. Reduced. The average rate at which the said stock was created is stated to be 90l. 12s. 3d. or nearly 90⅝ per cent. The amount of the Exchequer bills funded was -principal, 6,843,550l.; and interest, 67,823l. A return of the highest and lowest prices of Consols in each year, from April 5, 1834, to April 5, 1844, shews the maximum and minimum price of that stock to have been, in 1834, 93 and 89; in 1835, 92⅞ and 89¼; in 1836, 92½ and 86⅜; in 1837, 93⅞ and 80⅞; in 1838, 95⅜ and 91⅞; in 1839, 93⅜ and 89¼; in 1840, 93 and 85⅞; in 1841, 90¼ and 87¼; in 1842, 97⅛ and 90⅛; and in 1843-44 (up to April), 99⅞ and 92⅞, exhibiting a fluctuation of just 7 per cent. Thus it is seen that Consols have never been under 90 since 1842-43, and that their lowest price during the above ten years was 80⅞. The extreme difference between the maximum and minimum price during the same period was 19⅜ per cent.

The Sinking Fund.—A return of the rate of increase of the Sinking Fund, from the first establishment of it by Mr. Pitt, in the year 1786, to the close of the continental war in 1815, in periods of five years, has been obtained and printed, on the motion of Mr. Wodehouse, M.P. for Norfolk. It hence appears that the amount of sinking fund actually appropriated was, from August 1786, to February 1787, 500,555l.; in the year ending February 1, 1791, 1,220,211l. exhibiting an increase of 719,656l. in five years; in the year ending February 1, 1796, 2,143,595l. exhibiting an increase of 923,384l. in five years; in the year ending February 1, 1801, 4,911,135l. exhibiting an increase of 2,767,539l. in five years; in the year ending February 1, 1806, 7,850,033l. exhibiting an increase of 2,983,897l. in five years; in the year ending February 1, 1811, 12,050,537l. exhibiting an increase of 4,200,503l. in five years; and in the year ending February 1, 1816, 14,109,512l. exhibiting an increase of 2,058,975l. in five years. Thus it appears that between the years 1786 and 1816, the amount of sinking fund actually appropriated was increased altogether by the sum of 13,608,957l. that is to say, from 500,555l. to 14,109,512l.

MATRIMONIAL SUITS.—A return on this subject (Parl. Ret. No. 354), shews that the number of matrimonal suits instituted in the Metropolitan and Diocesan Court in England, from 1840—1843, was 160, in Wales 2, in Ireland 16, and in Scotland 169. This disproportion between Scotland and England, is curious, and its causes would be worth examination. Perhaps it arises from the slight circumstances considered sufficient to constitute a contract of marriage. Lord Eldon once said "He had been a long time trying to discover what would not make a marriage in Scotland." The number of Divorce Acts passed in the same four years were 27, and the average amount of the fees of the House of Lords on each Act was 87*l.* 16s. 10d. In the Court of Session, the only Court in Scotland having jurisdiction in matters matrimonial, the average expense where the proof is simple and clear, is about 30*l.*; in other cases, upwards of 500*l.*

THE MAGISTRATE.

Summary.

The concluding article in the Bill for altering the Law of Settlement will appear next week. In the interim, any remarks upon the subject from correspondents will be acceptable; for upon this subject, which is so materially interwoven with the peculiarities of local practice, we can alone render the Law Times as useful to the Profession as we desire to make it by mutual communication of opinion and facts.

THE LAWYER.

Summary.

We give below the first part of a review of the principal changes in the law effected by the recent insolvency Acts. It will be continued in our next or following number. We have commented elsewhere upon the recent proceedings at the Central Criminal Court and Middlesex Sessions.

THE LATE ALTERATION IN THE LAW BY 7 & 8 Vict. Cap. 96.

No. I.

This statute is, as our readers probably know, to be construed with 5 & 6 Vict. c. 116, where not inconsistent or at variance with it, and both are to be taken and construed analogously to the bankrupt laws. This inveterate habit of our legislators to make every statute dependent on others increases the difficulties of interpretation tenfold. To assist, therefore, those who have not had time to go minutely through its provisions, we purpose giving a summary view of the changes which it has made in the law. In doing this, we shall follow the division suggested by the title of the Act, and consider, first—the alterations in the Law of Insolvency; next, those in the Law of Bankruptcy; and, lastly, the alteration in the Law of Execution.

The Act has been already printed in our columns (supra, p. 397), so that we shall content ourselves with referring to the different sections, wherever the words are not absolutely necessary to convey a correct notion of the changes.

1.—Insolvency.

Who may petition.—Under the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 116, it was held that persons first made liable to the bankrupt laws by 5 & 6 Vict. c. 122, were non-traders, and could therefore petition under that Act. (3 Law T. 208.) The reason was, that the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 116 came into operation Aug. 12, 1842, and contained the words "not being a trader within the meaning of the statutes now in force and relating to bankrupts;" and cap. 122 did not come into operation until Nov. 22. Now, however, the form of petition prescribed by the Act is, "that your petitioner is not a trader within the meaning of the statutes now in force," &c. The form given by the rules under 5 & 6 Vict. was the same, but they could not alter the effect of the statute. These persons are, apothecaries, auctioneers, brickmakers, carriers, coach proprietors, cowkeepers, limeburners, livery stable-keepers, market gardeners, millers, and shipowners; and none of these can now petition.

On the other hand, prisoners who could not avail themselves of 5 & 6 Vict. 116, are within the present Act (sec. 4).

Petition and Schedule.—No prior notice is now required of the petition (sec. 1). The form is now strictly prescribed, and any deviation is by express enactment made fatal (sec. 2). It must also be accompanied by an affidavit of its truth, the form of which must be adhered to under a similar penalty. The principal alteration in the body of the petition is, that it now contains the following allegation:—

"That your petitioner has not parted with or charged any of his property (except for the necessary support of himself and his family, and the necessary expenses (not exceeding £) of this his petition, or in the ordinary course of trade), at any time within three months of the date of filing of this his petition, or at any time with a view to this petition."

Any false statement will be perjury (sec. 40).

It was doubtful, under 5 & 6 Vict. c. 116, whether the schedule could be amended; it may now be so, at the direction of the commissioner (secs. 3 and 29). The petitioner may now also except from the operation of the Act (as under the Insolvent Acts) "the wearing apparel, bedding, and other necessaries of the petitioner and his family, and the working tools and implements, not exceeding in the whole the value of 20*l*." (sec. 9); but, in addition to the penalty for wilfully retaining more than this value (sec. 39, and 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, sec. 99), this Act enacts that the excepted articles, with the value thereof, shall be "fully and truly described by the petitioner in his schedule, or otherwise the exception thereof shall be of no force as to any part of the same." The importance of accuracy in this respect is therefore plain, although probably amendments would be allowed under sec. 3, where no fraud was intended.

Interim order.—An important amendment of the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 116 has been made by sec. 6 (and see sec. 58), which indemnifies the sheriff or other officer for discharging a prisoner in execution, whether the prisoner is ultimately declared entitled to the protection or not. This difficulty was provided for by 6 Geo. 4, c. 16, s. 117, in cases of bankruptcy, and by 7 Geo. 4, c. 57, s. 81, in cases of insolvents, but strangely overlooked in 5 & 6 Vict. c. 116. Consequently, in Marsh v. Woolley (1 Dow. & Lowndes, 84), where the sheriff had arrested the insolvent on a ca. sa. after the interim order had been obtained, the Court of Common Pleas, in ordering him to be discharged, refused to make the sheriff or the plaintiff pay the costs of the application, for they said there is no indemnity provided for the sheriff; and .

"The danger in which a sheriff would be placed by discharging an insolvent without the protection of such a clause of indemnity as that contained in the latter Act, is pointed out by Mr. Justice Taunton, in Saffery v. Jones (2 B. & Ad. 602). He observes, 'But for section 81, the gaoler was between two fires: if he did not discharge the prisoner pursuant to the order of the Insolvent Court, he would probably be liable to an action by him; if he did discharge him, he might be liable to an action for an escape at the suit of the creditor.' With respect to the plaintiff, he seems to have been also ignorant at the time of the arrest that any order of protection had been given to the defendant, and, indeed, it does not appear that the order had at that time reached the defendant; and when the plaintiff was afterwards applied to for his authority to discharge the defendant, he was placed in this dilemma, that if he had given his consent to the defendant's liberation, and the defendant had been discharged, and had afterwards failed to make out the statements in his petition, the commissioner's order would be void, and the discharge of the defendant by the act of the plaintiff would be a bar to all future remedies under his judgment."

Examination.—By rule 7, made under 5 & 6 Vict. c. 116, the time to be appointed for hearing the petition was to be not less than five, and not more than eight weeks from the date of the advertisement of the intention to petition. This advertisement is no longer necessary, and the Commissioner is to appoint a public sitting for the first examination of the petitioner "whenever he shall think fit," and may adjourn it from time to time. (Sec. 3.) By sec. 33, any advertisement or other proceeding in pursuance of this Act is freed from stamp duty, and the duty of giving the notices devolves upon the Court, not upon the petitioner, and the notice of the filing is, by sec. 3, required to be "forthwith." As to effect of no notice being given, see Home's Insolvent Acts, p. 8.

Attendance of creditors.—Some doubts having been entertained by the commissioners as to the necessity of personal attendance of creditors under 5 & 6 Vict. c. 116, it is now distinctly enacted that they may "attend by their attorneys, duly authorized by letters of attorney."

Grounds of refusal.—These are the same as under 5 & 6 Vict. c. 116; and among them is to be mentioned, becoming indebted by gross or culpable negligence, and that the allegation in the petition, or the matters in the schedule are untrue. (See Horry's Insolvent Laws, p. 26.) The questions of fraudulent preference, and vexatious defence, have been left undecided by the late Act!! We have, however, already quoted from Mr. Horry's work (supra, p. 448) to shew that now a vexatious defence will be considered a ground of refusal; and sec. 27 appears to give a general power to the commissioner to refuse upon any ground that he may think fit, and they will probably, therefore, hold a fraudulent preference equally a ground of refusal, especially as by sec. 18, it is void against the assignees. (See 1 Law T. pp. 234, 433, 556, and 2 Law T. pp. 53, 76, 266, 354, 355, 375, on both these points, under the 5 & 6 Vict.)

Petitioner in custody.—Sec. 7 is new, and we are unable to see the intention of the framers of the Act, or the cases in which it will be put into operation, unless it be to give a new species of day-rule, to enable a prisoner to obtain a change of air.

Limit of imprisonment for debt.—Sec. 28 is also a new and, in one point, most extraordinary enactment. The first part empowers the commissioner at his discretion to free an insolvent from imprisonment, notwithstanding his conduct shall have been such as to exclude him from the class of unfortunate debtors for whom the benefits of the Act were intended. This is strange; but if the power be only used in cases where the final order has been refused, or adjourned upon technical objections, little evil will arise from it. But the last proviso has not attracted the attention it deserves from the Profession or the public. It is as follows:—

"Provided always that no debtor shall be imprisoned on any process for more than twelve calendar months for any debt contracted before filing this petition, in case the final order shall be refused, or shall not be made, or in case the protecting order shall not be renewed."

The effect of this section is very obscure. Does it enact that any petitioner who can get his petition on the file, and obtain his interim order, will be released from prison if he has been in prison twelve months for any debt contracted before the filing of his petition, or, if he should hereafter be imprisoned, he will be entitled to his discharge at the end of twelve months, without reference to the nature of the debts, the conduct of the debtor, or any other circumstance? This seems to contradict sec. 6, and yet the words are most general: "any process, and in case the protecting order shall not be renewed." On the other hand, no mode of availing himself of the provision is pointed out, and as the granting the interim order seems to be almost a matter of course, and the creditor to be left to re-imprison his debtor if he can, this clause would amount to a virtual limit of imprisonment for debt in all cases to twelve months, barring the slight risk incurred by a debtor by a false statement in the petition. We express our opinion on this section with great diffidence, for we confess that we are completely puzzled to discover what its real meaning is.

Assignees.—Numerous additions have been made to 5 & 6 Vict. c. 116, on the rights of assignees, assimilating their position to that of assignees in bankruptcy. The strange omission in 5 & 6 Vict. c. 116, of any power to distribute the property, is supplied (sec. 31), and this notwithstanding the death of the petitioner (sec. 8); the various provisions in the Bankruptcy Acts as to acceptance of leases (sec. 12), powers of suing (sec. 18), transfers of stock (sec. 15), reputed possession (sec. 17), limitation of landlord's right to distrain (sec. 18), voluntary preference (sec. 19), warrants of attorney and cognovits (sec. 20; see Laurence v. Laurence, 1 Dowl. & Lownd. 219), &c. &c. are inserted in this Act. The voluntary preference clause contains the additional words, "in contemplation of his becoming insolvent," describing the circumstances which will avoid a gift, conveyance, &c. and also awards such gift, &c. "to any person who is or may be liable as surety for the petitioner."

We must reserve our observations on the question, whether the insolvent's future property is or is not liable to his debts, for our next number.

THE PROPERTY LAWYER.

Rolfe, B. was of opinion that the power had not been duly executed. After stating the facts, he said:—

"The only point to be considered is, whether, according to the terms of the power, it is necessary, not merely that the testatrix should sign, seal, and publish, in the presence of three credible persons, who should sign their names as witnesses, but further, that the fact of that having been done should be expressed on the face of the attestation. If the case of Wright v. Wakeford (17 Vesey, 454, and 4 Taunt. 213) be a decision which ought to be considered as binding on this House, then it is clear that the will would not have been a valid execution of the power, if, instead of the word 'witness,' there had been the words 'sealed and published in the presence of;' and the first point to be considered is, whether this variation in the form of the attestation, i. e. the use of the general word 'witness' instead of the special words 'sealed and published in the presence of,' makes any real difference in principle—whether the doctrine involved in the case of Wright v. Wakeford at all turns on the point of the attestation being special and not general—I am of opinion that it does not. The principle on which that case proceeded was, that the power, according to its true construction, required a form of attestation expressing that the parties executing the instrument had signed as well as sealed in the presence of the witnesses, i. e. an attestation expressing a compliance with all the acts required by the power. This is stated by the majority of the judges who certified to have been the ground on which their certificate proceeded; and, because the attestation in that case expressed a compliance with one only of the requisites of the power, namely, sealing, and was silent as to the other, namely, signing, therefore they held that the attestation did not on the face of it necessarily import a compliance with both requisites, and was consequently bad. Now, here there is no form of attestation at all; the witnesses merely sign their names under the word 'witness;' and the argument by which the present case is attempted to be distinguished from Wright v. Wakeford is, that here there is no expressio unius which may reasonably lead to the exclusio alterius—that, as nothing is expressed, all may fairly be presumed. If the question were, what was in fact done at the time of the execution—whether the executing party really did sign, seal, and publish in the presence of those persons who have subscribed their names as witnesses—the distinction might perhaps be of great importance; but the question, when it is attempted to distinguish this case from Wright v. Wakeford, is, not what in fact was done at the time of the execution, but what the attestation necessarily imports to have been done. Looking at the question in this point of view, it seems to me just as impossible to say of a general as of a special attestation, that it necessarily imports a compliance with all the terms of the power. I am, therefore, of opinion that the present case cannot be successfully distinguished from Wright v. Wakeford. If that be so, it remains to consider whether that case is or is not one which your lordships ought to treat as binding on this House as the ultimate court of appeal. Now, the certificate in Wright v. Wakeford was given, it is to be observed, in Hilary Term 1812, being above thirty years before it has been called in question in this House, and above twenty years before the present ejectments were brought. It was a certificate of three most eminent judges, delivering an opinion, differing, it is true, from that of Sir James Mansfield, but concurring, I think it must be considered, with that of Lord Eldon. It is true that we have no report of what was done by the Court of Chancery on the return of the certificate; and it must be admitted that the mere refusal to decree a specific performance in such case would certainly not of itself conclusively shew Lord Eldon's view of the law; but it is difficult to read the report of his judgment, in 17 Vesey, 434, when he directed the opinion of the Court of Common Pleas to be taken, without believing that his mind then strongly leaned towards the view of the law afterwards adopted by Mr. Justice Heath, Mr. Justice Lawrence, and Mr. Justice Chambre: besides, Lord Eldon held the Great Seal for more than fifteen years after the certificate was given; and, if he had not considered it as correctly laying down the law, it is difficult to believe that he would not, either during the progress through Parliament of the retrospective act to which it gave rise,(a) or on some occasion either in the Court of Chancery or in this House, have expressed his doubts on the subject; more especially considering the great respect and deference which Lord Eldon always expressed towards Sir James Mansfield, whose opinion was opposed to that of the other three judges. With a judgment, then, proceeding from such judges, and thus sanctioned, it is impossible not to feel the very strong probability that sales and purchases may have been made, and titles have been accepted and rejected, for a period now exceeding a quarter of a century, on the faith of the law being such as the case of Wright v. Wakeford stated it to be: and, though such considerations are not necessarily binding on this House, like an Act of Parliament, yet they have, in doubtful cases, like the practice of conveyancers, been always treated as of great weight in ascertaining what the law is. Now, with reference to the present question, there has been not only an acquiescence in the case of Wright v. Wakeford, and it must be presumed a practice among conveyancers conformable to it, for a period of more than thirty years; but there has been also a long string of cases recognizing it as settled law—following it where the facts have been the same, and distinguishing it where they have been different. The first case which occurred on this point after the decision of Wright v. Wakeford, was Doe dem. Mansfield v. Peach (2 M. & Sel. 576). There the terms of the power and the form of the attestation were substantially the same as in Wright v. Wakeford. The Court of King's Bench took time to consider their judgment, expressly with the view of deciding between the conflicting opinions of the Chief Justice and the other judges of the Court of Common Pleas; and, after deliberation, Lord Ellenborough, in pronouncing the judgment of the Court of King's Bench, expressed his concurrence with the doctrine laid down in the certificate of the three judges, and stated the true principle to be that the attestation must be co-extensive with the things required to be done. This decision was in Easter Term, 1814; and, when the same question was again attempted to be argued in the case of Wright v. Barlow (3 M. & Sel. 512, in Hilary Term, 1815, in the Court of King's Bench), and in Doe dem. Hotchkiss v. Pearce (6 Taunt. 402), in Michaelmas Term, 1815, in the Common Pleas, Lord Ellenborough in the one court, and Chief Justice Gibbs in the other, said they considered the question as settled by the preceding decisions. Two years afterwards the same question arose in the case of Moodie v. Reid (7 Taunt. 355), which was a case from Chancery. The power there was to appoint by any will signed and published in the presence of and attested by two or more credible witnesses; in the testimonium clause the testatrix says that 'these bequests are signed by me,' but there was no clause of attestation, except the word 'witness' preceding the names of the witnesses. Chief Justice Gibbs stated (whether quite accurately is not now the question) that this was clearly a good attestation of the signing, but added, that the question was whether by attesting the signing the witnesses also attested the publication. Now, it appeared clearly in that case that the testatrix in fact signed the will in the presence of the two witnesses, and at the time of doing so made use of expressions indicating that the instrument was her will. This, I conceive, was clearly a publication; and the doubt, therefore, must have been, not whether the will was in fact published, but whether the attestation sufficiently expressed that it had been published in the presence of the witnesses. The Court, after taking time to consider, certified against the validity of the execution, manifestly on the ground of the insufficiency of the attestation—adopting to its full extent the principle of the previous cases. The next reported case in which this principle was acted on was Stanhope v. Keir (2 Sim. & Stu. 37), where Sir J. Leach held that a power to appoint by a will signed and published in the presence of and attested by two credible witnesses was ill executed by a will in which the attestation did not extend to the publication; and in Buller v. Burt (an unreported case in 1829), the same learned judge held, on the same ground, that, where the power was to appoint by a deed signed, sealed, and delivered in the presence of and attested by two witnesses, the appointment was bad by reason of the attestation not extending to delivery. It is true that in that case his Honour is reported to have held, that, where the form of attestation is general, the witnesses must be taken to attest all which is stated in the body of the deed to be done in their presence, and, consequently, that, if in the body of the deed the instrument had been stated to have been delivered, as well as signed and sealed, in the presence of the witnesses, he should have held the power well executed. That opinion, however, was not necessary to support the judgment; it was therefore extra-judicial, and, as I humbly conceive, altogether erroneous—assuming, as it does, contrary to every day's experience, that the contents of the deed are known to the witnesses.

"In the case of Hougham v. Sandys (2 Simons, 95), a question arose as to the application of the retrospective Act in that particular case. The facts there are not applicable to the present, but the case is so far important as affording an additional recognition of the general doctrine.

"These cases were followed by several others in which the question arose whether, where the power required a will signed and published in the presence of and attested by three witnesses, the attestation was good, expressing the will to have been signed and delivered in the presence of and attested by the three witnesses—whether, in short, delivery under such circumstances was not the same thing as publication. His Honour the Vice-Chancellor of England, in Simeon v. Simeon (4 Simons, 558), and in Lempriere v. Valpy (5 Simons, 118), held that it was: and the same thing was decided by the Court of Exchequer in Ward v. Swift (1 Cr. & M. 171), and Curteis v. Kenrick (3 M. & W. 461). These decisions evidently left the general question untouched. The principle is not that the words of the attestation must be the same as those of the power, but that they must necessarily import a compliance with all the requisites of the power; and, when once it was decided, as a matter of construction, that delivery means the same thing as publication, the consequence necessarily followed that the powers in those cases were well executed.

"In the more recent case of Mackinlay v. Sison (8 Simons, 561), his Honour the Vice-Chancellor of England decided in favour of the appointment, on similar grounds. Whether it is quite clear that the words of attestation there used did necessarily import publication, may perhaps admit of doubt; but it is sufficient to say that such was the ground on which the judgment rested.

"The only remaining case is that of Waterman v. Smith, decided by the same learned judge, the Vice-Chancellor of England, so lately as the year 1840, and reported in 9 Simons, 629. There the only question was as to the validity of an appointment made under circumstances exactly the same as those which existed in Wright v. Wakeford. His Honour treated that case as established law, and would not hear the counsel who were to have argued in support of it. The property in question in that case was administered on the assumption of the law being such as was laid down in Wright v. Wakeford; and there can be no doubt but that in other unreported cases the same principle has been acted on. Such being the uniform current of the authorities during a period of more than thirty years, and the rule itself being one which results naturally from the language of the power, is easily intelligible, and well calculated to secure accuracy in carrying out the intentions of those by whom powers are given, I see no reason to think that it was not well laid down at first, and still less to think that it ought now to be departed from; and I beg leave therefore, in answer to your lordships' question, to say that, in my opinion, the power in question was not duly executed."

MAULE, J. briefly gave his opinion that the power was well executed, on the ground that he could not doubt the substantive in the power to which the participle attested was to be referred was the will which was mentioned, not signature, execution, &c. which were not mentioned; for, said that learned judge,

As to the decisions, he considered that there was none in which a will, purporting on the face of it to be duly executed and attested generally, had been held to be a bad execution of such a power as the present.

"If this be otherwise, it will be necessary when a party creating a power means that the will shall be attested, to state that the power must be executed by will signed, by will sealed, by will published, and by will attested. It is doing as much violence to language to consider signature, &c. to be the substantive to which attested is to be applied, as it would be to consider signature to be that to which seal is to be applied, and to require that the signature should be sealed in order to a good execution."

ERSKINE, J. after stating the facts, said:—

"Before I proceed to examine the several authorities cited in support of this position, I would remind your lordships, that, although in the case of a common bond or deed, the execution must be by sealing and delivering the instrument, and although in most instances the attesting witnesses sign their names under a memorandum that the deed was sealed and delivered in their presence, yet that, in point of law, a person who has signed his name to the word 'witness,' is considered as much the attesting witness to the instrument as if he had signed the more formal attestation. So, also, although by the statute of frauds the Legislature required that all devises of lands should be attested and subscribed, in the presence of the devisor, by three or more credible witnesses, it has always been held that a devise of land was well attested by the witnesses subscribing their names to the word 'witness,' as in the case now under discussion. From this it is clear that in general the execution of an instrument may be well attested, although the memorandum of attestation does not specify the acts that were necessary to make the execution effectual and perfect. In what respect, then, did a devise of land, made before the late statute of her present Majesty, in execution of a power, vary from any other devise of land? In this respect only, that its execution must have been attended with all the formalities prescribed by the donor of the power, as well as with those prescribed by the statute of frauds; and therefore if the donor of the power had required that the memorandum of attestation should be in a specific form, a general attestation like that under discussion would have been insufficient. But the donor of the power has not in this case prescribed any particular form of attestation; and, therefore, when he uses the term 'attested,' he must, I think, be taken to use it in its ordinary sense; and we have seen that when taken in its ordinary sense, both as applicable to deeds and wills under the statute of frauds, the term is fully satisfied by the witnesses affixing their signature to the word 'witness.' Why, then, should it be necessary, that, in a will made in execution of a power, the memorandum of attestation should state the particulars of the execution? The object of the attestation is in both cases the same, namely, that the persons whose interests may be affected by the will should have the means of knowing who the parties present were, and of ascertaining through them whether the requirements of the statute in the one instance, and of the power in the other, had been duly complied with; and this purpose is as well answered by a general as by a particular attestation. And that no sufficient reason exists for requiring in such cases a special memorandum of attestation may be now affirmed without presumption, since the Legislature has thought it right to declare that no form of attestation shall for the future be necessary to render valid an appointment by will, even though the donor of the power may have expressly required it. (7 Wm. 4 & 1 Vict. c. 26, s. 10.) As the donor of the power, therefore, in this case has not required any special attestation, and as all that he has required is found to have been performed, I can discover no legal principle on which your lordships should be called upon to declare the power not well executed."

(a) 54 Geo. 3, c. 168.

He then examined the decisions, to shew that they would not be overruled if this power were held to be well executed. In Wright v. Wakefield (4 Taunt. 213) and Doe dem. Mansfield v. Peach (2 M. & Sel. 57 he said—

"Now, the decision might be supported upon one of two grounds, either that it was necessary that the memorandum of attestation should in terms expressly specify the several formalities which the witnesses professed to attest, or that, as the memorandum of attestation in that case expressly stated that the deeds were sealed and delivered in the presence of the witnesses, their signatures would be taken as attesting those facts, and those only. If the case was decided upon the first of these grounds, it would be a direct authority against the plaintiffs in error in the case before the House; if upon the latter, it would leave untouched the question as to the sufficiency of a general attestation like the present. The certificate does not clearly point out upon which of these grounds the learned judges who signed it rested their judgment; and, as the decision might, in my opinion, be well supported upon the latter ground, although inconsistent with some of the cases under the statute of frauds, I should not have considered it as an authority conclusive on the present inquiry, especially as I do not find that any case was cited, either at the Bar or from the Bench, that would support the former proposition. But the difficulties with which the plaintiffs in error have to contend, arise not so much upon the case of Wright v. Wakeford, as reported, as upon the interpretation put upon that decision in later cases. In Doe dem. Mansfield v. Peach (2 M. & Sel. 576), the Court of King's Bench adopted the decision of Wright v. Wakeford, and the reasons given in the certificate of the three puisne judges; but in delivering the judgment of the Court, Lord Ellenborough makes use of this expression:—'But it seems to us, that, to make a due execution of the power, there must be a making of an instrument with all the forms required by the power, and that there must be an attestation of its execution with all those forms. The intention of the parties was that the attestation should be co-extensive with the things required to be done; and this makes the case directly the same as Wright v. Wakeford.' But, although it may be collected from this passage, that it was the opinion of the Court of King's Bench that the witnesses could only be considered as attesting the circumstances specified in the memorandum of attestation, yet, as in that case the memorandum specified two of the requisites, and omitted the third, the decision of the case does not necessarily exclude the sufficiency of a general form of attestation like that now under consideration."

He then referred to Wright v. Barlow (3 M. & Sel. 312), Doe dem. Hotchkiss v. Pearce (6 Taunt. 402), and Ward v. Swift (1 Cr. & M. 171), and said, that none of them appeared to him to be authorities—that a general attestation like this was insufficient. In Stanhope v. Keir (2 Sim. & Stir. 37), the learned judge observed, "that it must be admitted that Sir J. Leach decided that by the adoption of this general form of attestation the witnesses could not be considered as attesting all that really took place at the execution, and that the Court could not refer the term 'witness' to the allegations in the will; and this case, therefore, is an authority against the opinion I have formed."

As to Buller v. Burt (cited in 4 Ad. & E. 15, 6 N. & M. 281), he said, in conclusion:—

"From the report of this case, Sir John Leach appears to have assumed, contrary to his former opinion in Stanhope v. Keir, that the Court might look to the will itself for the purpose of ascertaining what facts had been attested by the witnesses when they affixed their signatures to the word 'witness,' and then to have decided, that, as there was no allegation on the face of the deed that it had been delivered, the witnesses could not be considered as attesting that fact to have taken place in their presence. This decision of Sir John Leach seems to have proceeded on the ground, that, assuming that all had taken place that the deed itself recites, and that the attestation was evidence of all the facts recited, still that there was no evidence of the deed having been delivered in the presence of the witnesses, and consequently no attestation of that fact. And, if this may be taken as the real ground of the decision, the case supports the view taken by the Court of King's Bench, and adopted by other learned judges in the Court of error, in the cases now under consideration, namely, that such a general form of attestation may be taken as referring to the allegations in the latter part of the will itself, and in effect to attest all that appears upon the face of the will to have been done; and would not interfere with another suggestion which I submit to your lordships' consideration, namely, that a general attestation like the present in effect attests the execution as it actually took place; and that, as the special verdict finds that all the required formalities were in fact complied with, the witnesses must be held to have attested that those formalities took place in their presence. The case of Stanhope v. Keir appears to me to be the only authority directly opposed to either of these grounds for concluding that the will was in this case well attested; and therefore, as the word 'witness' must be taken to refer either to the facts that really took place, or to the acts recited in the latter part of the will, and as it appears, both from the facts found by the special verdict, and by the statements in the will that precede the signature of the testatrix, that all that was required by the donor of the power was actually done, I think the attestation was sufficient, and I answer your lordships' question in the affirmative."

Coltman, J. referred to his judgment reported in 9 Ad. & E. 940; 1 P. & D. 671; that the power was not well executed, and expressed his adherence to the reasons and conclusions there stated.

The following letter appeared in the Legal Observer of last week:—

"TRESPASS BY BALLOON.

"To the Editor of the Legal Observer.

"Sir,—This being vacation time, it is, perhaps, allowable to moot the following point:—A client of mine who has been much troubled of late by aeronauts hovering over his dwelling, has asked and obtained the following novel advice. First, for A to sail over B's field in a balloon, is actionable by trespass quare clausum fregit, inasmuch as what is mine, is mine usque ad cœlum; secondly, throwing dust or sand into landsmen's eyes would not deter a jury from seeing fit to give damages in a specially invented action of trespass quare clausum, vi et armis, and case for the consequential damages; and, thirdly, that to alight on my client's field would be an injury still more atrocious, and subject the offender and invader to service of declaration in ejectment on the spot, in addition to all or any of the aforesaid remedies, besides that of seizing his car as a realty fixture, should it get linked in with the timber of the estate.

"I hope the above will tend to raise the hopes of country practitioners to the clouds.

REGISTRATION AND REGULATION OF JOINT-STOCK COMPANIES.

A very important act received the royal assent on Thursday, the 5th instant, entitled "An Act for the Registration, Incorporation, and Regulation of Joint Stock Companies," the object of which is to bring under the eye of government all joint-stock companies, and to prevent the establishment of fraudulent concerns with high-sounding names and pretended patronage, whereby persons with the promise of a high rate of interest have been deprived of their money and reduced to great distress. There are eighty sections in the act, with several schedules annexed. It has immediate operation from the 5th instant, with respect to the officers to be appointed for the registration of companies, and the regulation of the office provided for that purpose, and all other provisions as to the companies to which they have application, on the 1st of November next. The preamble of the act, on consideration of which the sections have been framed, declares it to be expedient to make provision for the due registration of joint-stock companies during the formation and subsistence thereof, and also after such complete registration to invest such companies with the qualities and incidents of corporations, with some modifications, and subject to certain conditions and regulations, and also to prevent the establishment of any companies which shall not be duly constituted and regulated according to the provisions of this act. It is provided, that before any advertisement or other proceeding appears of an intended joint stock company (which term has a very large signification), a provisional registration shall take place at the "Registry-office," giving certain particulars, in order to guard against mere adventurers obtaining money from the public, and in the event of non-registration as described, the promoter to be liable to be fined 20*l*. A complete registration is to take place before a company can act other than provisionally, and full information afforded respecting the deed of the company, &c. Patrons and directors must in future hold shares in the company, under a penalty of 20*l*., and the inspection of books is given to shareholders under certain by-laws, in order that the affairs of companies may be ascertained, and any director or officer who shall wrongfully "do or omit any act" with intent to defraud the company or any shareholder therein, or falsify or fraudulently mutilate, or fraudulently make any erasure in the books of accounts or books of registry, or any document belonging to the company, then such director or other officer shall be deemed to be guilty of a misdemeanour. The following provision has been framed to prevent fraudulent companies:—Section [illegible]. "And forasmuch as great injury has been inflicted upon the public by companies falsely pretending to be patronized or directed or managed by eminent or opulent persons; now, for the purpose of preventing such false pretences, be it enacted, with regard to every company or pretended company whatsoever, whether registered or not, and whether now existing or not, that if any person shall make any such false pretences, knowing the same to be false, in any advertisement or other paper, whether printed or written, and whether published in any newspaper, or handbill, or placard, or circular, then every such person shall forfeit for every such offence a sum not exceeding 10*l.*" By another provision it is enacted, that if a judgment in law or decree, &c., cannot be enforced against a company, then it may be enforced against the person, property, and effects of a shareholder, who shall have his remedy against the company. Various penalties are prescribed; and by another provision, the registrar of joint-stock companies is to make an annual report to the Privy Council of Trade, setting forth the particulars mentioned in the 79th section of the present Act, which report is to be laid before Parliament.

ATTORNEYS' CLERKS.—We understand that none but articled clerks will in future be allowed to act in any case as professional advisers at the Mansion House. This resolution will probably be followed at the other police-offices.

MARRIAGES.—By an Act passed in the late session concerning banns and marriages in certain district churches or chapels, various doubts which had arisen are removed respecting the legality of such marriages, and it is declared that in every case in which a district has been or shall be assigned to any church or chapel under the Church Building Acts, it shall be determined by the commissioners and the bishop of the diocese whether banns of matrimony shall be published and marriages solemnized in any church or chapel or not. The following clause has been framed to render marriages valid which have already taken place, and provision is made for future cases. Section 3. "And whereas by error banns have been published, and divers marriages have been solemnized, in chapels with districts assigned to them under the provisions of the hereinbefore recited Acts, or some of them, but in which chapel banns could not be legally published nor marriages by law be solemnized, and it is expedient to remove difficulties arising from the circumstances aforesaid touching the validity of such marriages; be it therefore enacted, that banns already published and marriages already solemnized in such chapels as aforesaid shall not hereafter be questioned on account of the said banns having been published or the said marriages solemnized in any such chapel as aforesaid; and the minister or ministers who solemnized the same shall not be liable to any ecclesiastical censure or to any other proceedings or penalties whatsoever by reason thereof, and the registers of all marriages so solemnized as aforesaid, or copies of such registers, shall be received in all courts of law and equity as evidence of such marriages respectively."

TRANSFER OF PROPERTY.—A short, but very comprehensive, Act was passed on the 6th ult. to simplify the transfer of property, which, however, will not take effect until the 31st of December next. There are fourteen sections in the statute, concisely worded and freed from all verbosity. The term "land" is to extend to manors, advowsons, messuages, lands, tithes, tenements, and hereditaments, whether corporeal or incorporeal; the word "freehold," to include customary freehold; "conveyance," to be extended in its signification; "person," to mean a corporation as well as an individual, and the word importing the singular number to apply to several as well as to one, and the masculine gender to the female as well as the male. Deeds need not be "indented," and persons, though not parties, are to take immediate benefit under the same. The following provision has been framed for the protection of trustees:—Section 10. "That the bonâ fide payment to, and the receipt of any person to whom any money shall be payable upon any express or implied trust, or for any limited purpose, or of the survivors or survivor of two or more mortgagees, or holders, or the executors or administrators of such survivor, or their or his assigns, shall effectually discharge the person paying the same from seeing to the application thereof, unless the contrary shall be expressly declared by the instrument creating the trust or security." The Act is not to extend to Scotland.

THE RAILWAY CARRYING TRADE.—We are enabled to make an announcement of the utmost importance to railway proprietors and the public in general. Whether it be the determined stand made by our Liverpool merchants, in the case of the South-Eastern and Dover Railway that has founded the movement, we know not, but it is now determined that railways in general shall become their own carriers, and no longer submit to the present system of intermediate parties being allowed to reap the profits. We congratulate our fellow-townsmen on the energetic exertions made by Liverpool gentlemen at the late Dover meeting; such services are the more to be valued as having been put forth in the face of a similarly overwhelming opposition; the room being filled with the directors, immediate friends, and supporters, who did their utmost to prevent our fellow-tradesmen from being heard. However, it is now clear that the carriers' monopoly on the Dover road is very soon to be laid low, and the proprietors will thus gain the fair earnings of the line. It is but fair that shareholders should net a fair return for their capital invested, and this must be the case with a line such as the South-Eastern and Dover. However, one grand matter is with the public, and it is a matter of the greatest importance to every one, that goods and parcels should be conveyed at the lowest possible charge. This is now immediately to be secured, and it is but honest that the town of Liverpool should have its fair credit for having brought about this vastly important result. The late Dover meeting has made all railway shareholders open their eyes to the treasure in store for them, and the public see in it increased accommodations and reduced charges. We are enabled to announce that the following leading lines of railway have resolved henceforth to become carriers, or, in the words of Mr. Robert Browne, one of our Liverpool merchants, "to labour for themselves." The lines are, the Great Western—the Grand Junction—the Bristol and Exeter—the Birmingham and Gloucester—the Bristol and Gloucester. These lines of railway have, within a few days past, resolved on making no allowance whatever to carriers, but to be carriers themselves, and to give the public every possible facility. We are also enabled to state that the directorate bodies of several grand trunk lines are considering the subject, with a view to the immediate adoption of the same system. Thus strengthened, the London and Dover line must succeed, and so the services of Liverpool will not have been thrown away, but be attended with increased advantages to the public, and immense benefit to the shareholders.—Liverpool Advertiser.

POOR'S ALLOTMENTS.—The following is a report of the advantages of the allotment system upon the estate of Mr. D. Sutton in the parish of Wiggington, near Tring:—About twelve months since a field of arable land in a convenient situation was divided into thirty-four allotments, varying from twenty to eighty poles each, and let to labourers for 2*l.* per acre, including tithes, rates, and taxes. The land to be cultivated after the first time by spade industry. The land was in a foul state, although naturally good corn land. The rent to be paid once a year. Monday last being the day appointed, the tenants assembled and paid their rent, with one exception, and that was a case where a man took rather more than he could manage, late in the season, and had not been able to gather any of the produce. After the rents were paid, and the tenants had partaken of some good old English cheer, prizes were distributed for the best specimen of the produce, and for the best cultivated allotment. The whole of them expressed their thanks for the benefits conferred, and the tenant who gained the latter prize, Charles Smart, who has a wife, and five children under fifteen years of age, thus alludes to it:—"I consider my rood of land has done me a great deal of good, and filled up my leisure time, and I hope next year to do still better. This year I have gathered peas for my own use, and have dug up several rows of potatoes, by which I can safely say I shall have seventy bushels altogether, which I consider worth 1s. 4d. per bushel; besides this, I have part in turnips, which I would not take 1*l.* for, making the value of one year's produce upon a quarter of an acre between 5*l.* and 6*l.*" The parish of Wiggington has ranked foremost in the list of thieves and poachers, and gained the appellation of "Wicked Wiggington," but it is gratifying to observe, that not one of the occupants of the allotments has been convicted of a theft or misdemeanor, and the parish has been very quiet and peaceable, and a great improvement is visible.

RIGHTS OF LANDLORDS.—There is a provision in the new Insolvent Debtors' Act affecting the rights of landlords which seems to have escaped notice. By the 67th section it is provided that no landlord of any tenement let at a weekly rent shall have any claim or lien upon any goods taken in execution under the process of any court of law for more than four weeks' arrears of rent; and if such tenement shall be let for any other term less than a year, the landlord shall not have any claim or lien for more than the arrears of rent accruing during such terms or times of payment. This enactment was necessary to prevent fraudulent contrivances to protect property as well as the person, which cannot now be touched for debts not exceeding 20*l.* Under the next clause, a claim by a landlord or any other person to cover property, can be investigated by the judge of the court out of which an execution by a creditor has issued, which provision was adopted to prevent law expenses in actions under the Interpleader Act.—Sunday Times.

PARISH CONSTABLES.—On the 29th of July last an Act came into operation to extend the powers of the Act for the appointment and payment of parish constables. There are five sections in the statute, and by the third it is enacted that no toll shall be demanded or taken on any turnpike-road or bridge for any horse or police van, carriage, or cart, passing along such road or bridge in the service of a superintendent constable, appointed under the Act 5 & 6 Victoria, c. 109, for the appointment and payment of parish constables, provided that the superintendent constable shall produce a certificate of his appointment, signed by the clerk of the peace, or shall have his dress according to the regulation of the said county, at the time of claiming the exemption; and every person who shall fraudulently claim or take the benefit shall for every offence be liable to a penalty of not exceeding 5*l.* and in all such cases the proof of exemption shall be upon the party claiming the same.

BURNING FARM BUILDINGS.—On the 6th ult. an Act came into operation to amend the law relating to burning farm buildings. It seems that doubts existed whether the provisions of the Act 7 Wm. 4 & 1 Vict. c. 89 extended to the offence of unlawfully and maliciously setting fire to any hovel or shed not being appended to any house, and therefore it is declared by the present statute that any hovel, shed, or fold, or any other building, shall be included, and on conviction the offender may be transported or imprisoned. Persons setting fire to hay, straw, wood, or other vegetable produce, being in any farm-house or building, or to any implement of husbandry therein, shall be liable to the pains and penalties mentioned for maliciously setting fire to a farm-house or other building. By the third provision it is provided that males under eighteen years of age may be whipped, not exceeding three times, in addition to any other sentence. This Act is to be deemed a part of the one recited.

IRISH JURY LISTS.—The correspondent of the Morning Chronicle states that Mr. Mahony has determined to commence legal proceedings against the majority of the cess-collectors, who failed to make a return of the qualified jurors within the time prescribed by law, and against all the collectors, for non-compliance with the provision of the Jury Act, which directs that the lists should be printed and published in the various parishes, previous to the returns being placed in the custody of the clerks of the peace.

IMPORTANT TO INSOLVENTS.—It cannot be too generally known that the commissioners of bankruptcy for the Birmingham district have come to the determination not to receive or recognize any petitions or schedules where the signature of the petitioner is not attested by a solicitor or some agent duly authorized by a warrant of attorney. It is obvious, under such circumstances, that persons desirous of applying for the benefit of the new Act must, at the outset, employ a solicitor. This is important, because in opposition to the instructions of Lord Brougham.—Birmingham Advertiser.

THE ROYAL MINT.—The workmen of this important establishment are busily at work in striking off a considerable quantity of new sovereigns and half-sovereigns on account of the Bank of England, preparatory to the payment of the October dividends, which will be in course of settlement in the Rotunda on the 14th of next month. The amount of bullion at present in the Bank is 15,197,000*l.* sterling. A large quantity of gold coinage has also been struck for Government during the last fortnight for the payment of the Army and Navy, the half-pay and pensions and pay of the officials of the Treasury, Foreign, Colonial, and Home offices, Stamps, Customs, Excise, &c. which are now in course of payment. An immense number of the new half-farthing coinage, which for the last ten days have been selling in the different thoroughfares of the metropolis at four and six a penny by the itinerant street venders, have been struck at the Mint for the last month, and will be issued as legal tenders of our copper circulation in currency on Tuesday next, the 1st of October, according to the Royal proclamation announcing their issue a year and a half ago, but which had been delayed in the United Kingdom, although in our colonies they have been for some time current. The various shopkeepers, grocers, and tea-dealers, in the Borough and different parts of the metropolis, have large bowls full of this new but useful coinage to the working or poorer classes in their windows, as "half farthings saved are pennies gained."

THE GREAT WILL CASE.—We have been waited on by Messrs. Richards and Walker, the solicitors of the executors of the late Mr. James Wood, of Gloucester, in relation to a paragraph which appeared in the Sun of Monday. They deny that any compromise has been entered into by the executors with the corporation of Gloucester, and state that the appeal to the House of Lords is still proceeding, and will be heard before their lordships as speedily as the rules and practice of the House will allow; and they state that they are ignorant of the fact that any further will or testamentary paper has been found, and they express their belief that any report to the contrary is without foundation.—Sun.

WILL OF SIR WILLIAM HEYGATE, BART.—The will of Sir William Heygate, Bart. late Chamberlain of the City of London, formerly alderman of Coleman-street ward, has just been proved in Doctors' Comment by Dame Isabella Heygate, widow, and Sir Wm. Heygate (the son), two of the executors, a power of proving being reserved for a son under age and a sister of the testator. The property is sworn under 45,000*l.* He gives to his wife, Dame Heygate, 100*l.* a year and the use of Roecliffe-hall, Leicester, with the plate, pictures, &c. belonging thereto, for her life, and at her death to his eldest son, if not purchased as stated below. He directs his property to be divided into five parts, to be distributed as follows:—Two parts to his eldest son, and the remaining three parts to three other sons, on the death of his wife, but till that event they are to be suitably provided for. To his brother, sister, and other relatives, mourning-rings. To his servants 20*l.* to be divided among them. Roecliffe-hall and his other property to be offered to his sons (if they wish to become purchasers), at a fair valuation. The will is short, and in the deceased's handwriting.—Britannia.

CORRESPONDENCE.

ATTORNEYS' GOWNS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

SIR,—In the LAW TIMES of Saturday last there is a letter from an attorney in Dorchester, in reference to Mr. Lott's difficulty of obtaining admission to courts of justice. I would beg to state, that at the Devon Assizes, some little time since, I had to defend a prisoner for felony, and being told that he was placed at the bar for trial, I hastened to gain admission to the Crown Court, but when I came to the door of the attorneys' boxes, I found that the sheriff's officer would not let me in. On looking round, I found that a friend of mine, an attorney of long standing and great respectability, was endeavouring to gain admission without avail. I desired the officer to let me in, when he said, "You can't go in: you are no attorney." My friend immediately answered, "He is, and you had better let us both in;" which he at last did, after a great delay, and we have threatened to report him to the sheriff. I know of no greater annoyance than being obliged to wait for half an hour before you can procure admission to the law courts, and I perfectly agree with the Dorchester attorney, that the only way to obviate the evil is to adopt, "one and all," the wearing of gowns when attending court.

I know full well that the greater part of the Profession would gladly adopt it, but no one will make a beginning; and many have recommended it, but have written anonymously. Now I beg to say that I should be happy to join any members of the Profession in order to put the wearing of the gown in practice; and am, Sir,

Yours truly,
J. T. SHAPLAND.

PREPARING AGREEMENTS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

SIR,—In reply to "A B" as to whether an auctioneer is legally entitled to prepare an agreement between parties, provided he makes no charge, I do not know of any law or custom to prevent him if no charge is made. But as this is done by auctioneers and brokers to a very great extent, and consequently solicitors are deprived greatly of their just emoluments, it should be their aim to discountenance it as much as they can, and if possible to put an end to it.

A case of this sort happened to myself personally. I had been spoken to about a lease that would probably be wanted, or an agreement for lease when a large house was let. The house was afterwards let, and I was expecting to receive instructions accordingly, but to my astonishment an agreement already prepared was brought me, prepared by an auctioneer, who was agent, and acted for the tenant; on my questioning the landlord (who brought it me) about it, he said that the auctioneer at the time the rent was agreed upon, said he could draw up the agreement, and he, the landlord, had consented to it; but I suppose, having some doubts in the legal knowledge of the auctioneer, he wished me to peruse and settle it, but which I declined professionally to do, as I would not be concerned in settling an agreement drawn by an auctioneer. Whether the latter made any charge for this I do not know.

I believe it to be the daily practice of auctioneers to draw up agreements, and if it can at any time be proved that they charge for doing so, they should be proceeded against: but as this is difficult to prove, the profession should so far discountenance the practice by not employing any auctioneer in sales, &c. who is guilty of so doing.

Another mode to remedy it would be, I think, for a regular and unvarying charge to be made by solicitors for all ordinary and common agreements, so that the public may know exactly the fee or sum they will have to pay. It is unquestionably true that many, very many, are deterred from coming to a solicitor by the fear of being charged for attendances, &c. in these small matters, and they therefore do not come.

I think that if a regular charge was fixed in this, and a scale of charges in all other matters relating to conveyancing, where it is possible to fix it, was made, so that all who have occasion might know it before hand, it would be more conducive to the interests of the profession.

THE LATE INSOLVENT ACT.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

SIR,—At the time of the above Act coming in force a client of mine had a debtor in execution for a debt under twenty pounds, and who was then and is now after his discharge in the receipt of a life annuity issuing out of real property. The concoctors of this notable Act should, I think, in justice to honest creditors of the above description have at once vested in them what property the discharged defendant might have been possessed of, instead of leaving such creditors to a loose and expensive remedy. Having but little knowledge of insolvency matters, and as the defendant alluded to is now laughing at the plaintiff, I should be glad if some one of your experienced correspondents would point out through your Journal the easiest and least expensive mode of getting possession of the annuity in question, if it is possible to be done.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

SIR,—A report in the TIMES of this morning of an occurrence at the Central Criminal Court on Saturday last induces me to address you on the subject thus early, lest your readers be misled as to the real facts of the case.

From this report it would seem that Mr. Crouch had been guilty of something very extraordinary in receiving a brief otherwise than from an attorney. I must confess my surprise that counsel of any standing in that court should venture to intimate that this was unusual. I have known the court for many years, but I never knew any objection to receiving a brief, for prosecution or defence, from any one, professional or not, at the Old Bailey. The endeavour to fix a stigma upon a junior for following the precedents established by his seniors, is cruel and unjust.

Mr. Alderman Wood is reported to have said that the city authorities had endeavoured to put an end to the abuses that have so long prevailed in that court. Will the worthy alderman point out a single rule or order that is achieving this object? I know that certain rules have lately been published which have the effect of removing certain gross evils from one spot and concentrating them in another, but I presume he does not allude to them. But does he really mean that any thing has yet been done in a genuine spirit to make the practice respectable and not exclusive? This is no difficult task, and yet there are no visible signs of its accomplishment. Perhaps the Legal Protective Association will assist in it? Then, and not till then, I fear, will the irregular practitioner (attorney or agent) begin to tremble.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

SIR,—Will you allow me, as an old subscriber, to inquire, whether it is legal for an attorney to share in the profits of the proctor whom he may employ, or to divide the commission on sales or purchases of stock with his broker? It appears to me to be highly derogatory to the character of a professional man, to do business on such terms with any person out of his own Profession, and that such a course is obviously fraught with the very worst possible consequences to clients.

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.

"TO THE EDITOR OF THE MORNING CHRONICLE.

"SIR,—I feel much grieved by the observation in your paper of to-day regarding me (concerning a trial of the Central Criminal Court), and as it may tend to do me great injury if the affair is left unexplained, I hope you will have the justice to insert the following explanation.

"Mr. Wilkins has assured me (and I do sincerely believe him), that when he used the strong expressions towards me (reported in your paper), he was not aware that it ever was allowed for a barrister attending the Central Criminal Court to act as counsel for a PROSECUTOR, unless an attorney was engaged. Had he been so informed, he would not have noticed the subject in the way he did.

"Yesterday, the counsel forming the bar of the Central Criminal Court met at the Middlesex Sessions, and it was agreed upon by all the gentlemen present, 'That the practice of the Bar attending the above court had always allowed the barrister to act as counsel either for the PROSECUTOR or the prisoner, although no attorney was employed by the parties; and that Mr. Crouch, in doing so, had neither acted unusually nor unprofessionally.'

"As the custom of the Bar thus fully sanctions my conduct on the trial in question, I hope you will see how important it is for my welfare to have this affair placed in its proper light before the public.

"I am always most anxious to conform to the practice of the Profession, and when I fail to do so it arises from the great difficulty of knowing what the rules are; each gentleman seems to form rules for himself, and expects that everybody else shall conform to his practice.

"Again begging your insertion of this letter,
"I remain, yours obediently,
"NEWTON CROUCH.

BARRISTERS AND ATTORNEYS.

"TO THE EDITOR OF THE MORNING HERALD.

"SIR,—As my name is mentioned in your report of the case Queen v. Thomson, at the Middlesex Sessions, as acting unprofessionally, I beg you will do me the favour to state that, in this case, my brief was delivered by an attorney, with whom I communicated, whose name is indorsed on the brief, and whose clerk attended, as well as myself, in court, on the 10th instant, the day first appointed for the trial. I will not now trouble you with the urgent causes of my absence, which was unexpected on Tuesday morning, as they have been satisfactorily explained in another and professional quarter; but I beg to assure you that it is so notorious that briefs are delivered at the Central Criminal Court and the Middlesex Sessions without attorneys, that I am astonished, in common with several of my seniors, that any practitioner at those courts should be ignorant of the custom which, though it may be strictly unprofessional, is a long-established one.

"I remain, Sir, yours very obediently,

"THE QUEEN ON THE PROSECUTION OF — PYKE, ESQ. DANIEL CUNNINGTON, HAMMOND, AND OTHERS v. WILLIAM THOMPSON.

"TO THE EDITOR OF THE MORNING HERALD.

"SIR,—Your report in this day's Morning Herald is calculated, without explanation, to seriously injure me, and in common justice, therefore, allow me to state that Mr. Horry, the retained counsel for this prosecution, was in attendance at the Middlesex Sessions on the 10th inst. the day originally fixed for the trial, with the attorney and witnesses, but in consequence of the defendant's application to the Court to postpone the trial, on the ground of the absence of a material witness, such trial was fixed for the 25th inst.

"On the 24th inst. from the difficult nature of the case, when it was too late for me to instruct other counsel, I was apprised that Mr. Horry could not attend until three o'clock the following day, and, on consultation with him, we agreed (as I am sure he will admit) that on my declining to give evidence there was no legal objection to my conducting the prosecution, in the event of its being called on before his arrival. I, therefore, consented to adopt this course.

"Allow me further to state that there was, and is, an attorney for this prosecution, who duly attended in that character on the 10th and 25th inst. and who had a direct communication, as such attorney, with Mr. Horry, the counsel for the prosecution; and, permit me to add that, notwithstanding the strong, unmerited, and uncalled-for observations of the learned Chairman of the Middlesex Sessions, reported by you, with regard to my conduct in conducting the case without an attorney, even had such been the case, I am still of opinion I should have acted only in accordance with the usual custom of the Bar of the London and Middlesex Sessions, who, at a recent meeting of the majority, stated 'that it had always been the practice of the Bar, attending London sessions, to act as counsel, either for the prosecution or prisoner, although no attorney was engaged in the case, and that a counsel so doing would neither act unusually nor unprofessionally.'

"Yours obediently,
"H. H. PYKE.

AGREEMENT STAMPS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

SIR,—There must certainly be a fatuity, if not a fatality, of vision superinduced by the very attempt to construe or define our stamp laws; both of your correspondents, "A Managing Clerk" [illegible] and "One, &c." [illegible], in their letters of last week, distinctly refer to the provisions of the [illegible] Act as imposing a duty of [illegible] of [illegible] on agreements exceeding [illegible]; both say that these duties still remain in full force; and then each of these gentlemen goes on to recommend the use of a 35s. stamp only upon an instrument of agreement exceeding fifteen folios.

ATTORNEYS' CLERKS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

SIR,—A correspondent, signing himself "A Solicitor," settles the practice before alluded to under this head in a summary, and, to himself, I have no doubt, satisfactory manner; and really, Sir, one cannot refrain from complaining of the ungenerous mode he has adopted of introducing a gratuitous attack on our body, in professing to elucidate a point of law; but, instead of doing so, or affording the slightest information, he has misstated the whole and only question, and concluded his observations by endeavouring to "slip his knife" into the unfortunate clerks.

Should a reference be made to the skeleton of my letter, which only appeared, the superfluous matter having been properly omitted as not bearing on the point in question, it will be seen that I merely suggested the acceptability of "information on the legality of attendance of attorneys' authorized clerks before the magistrates," and "A Solicitor," by way of introducing an answer, very coolly says, "he sees that I wish the question whether I can be allowed to act as an advocate to be settled!!" and then he refers to the clause in the late Act which allows certificated attorneys and barristers to practise. Sir, I never thought of any thing so ludicrously absurd as the question "A Solicitor" would put into my mouth. The simple point on which I thought information would be acceptable was, whether the practice permitted, if not sanctioned, by the judges and magistrates, of attorneys' authorized clerks appearing before them was, or was not, legal? in other words, whether such an attendance would render a clerk liable to the penal clauses of the Act?

I never provoked the fulsome eulogistic language with which "A Solicitor" has so ridiculously bespattered the gentlemen of the bar, and of the roll. Nor did I seek to entrap him into an exhibition of his utter ignorance of the business of a solicitor's office. He says, "No one ever dreamed of the managing clerk of a barrister offering himself as an advocate," and I must add my belief that no one ever had such a dream; but "A Solicitor" appears to have wasted a thought on that nonentity a barrister's managing clerk.

And now, Sir, what have we done to entitle us to the venomous outpourings of "A Solicitor's" wrath? —why the sweeping accusation against attorneys' clerks in the close of his letter? As one of that body, I take leave to ask what right "A Solicitor" has to indulge his vituperating propensity at the expense of the untarnished reputation of men of respectability and integrity, who would scorn to "transact any thing oppressive, or unfair, or ungentlemanly in an office?" Were we capable of acting with the atrocity imputed to us, undoubtedly we should deserve branding as vagabondizing scoundrels, and the opprobrium attached to the name of "lawyer's clerk" by the lower orders of society would be ineradicable, because well deserved.

Having digressed thus much in vindication, I will shortly recur to the "questioned practice" for the purpose of shewing that "A Solicitor," notwithstanding his refrence to the clause in the Act, does not think it illegal. He says, "Absence or illness of a principal may allow of the violation of the rule in permitting a boná fide managing clerk occasionally acting for his principal, and no fair man could object to this." Why, Sir, this is the very point on which I thought information necessary. The practice is or is not legal. If illegal, the law will not violate a rule because of the illness or absence of a principal. No such matter could be recognized, nor could an issue be raised on it. Suppose proceedings were commenced against a clerk under the penal clause of the Act, how would the defence that the principal was ill, or absent, be made available? If legal, such an excuse would certainly be unnecessary; it would be sufficient to shew that the defendant was representing a qualified practitioner.

Personally I feel but little present interest in this matter. The point is of considerable moment to men of large practice, and the thanks of the Profession are due for your notice of the subject, to which it will not be necessary again to call your attention.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

A MANAGING CLERK.

SELECTIONS FROM CORRESPONDENCE.

"AN ARTICLED CLERK" comments with great reason upon the proposal to increase the admission stamp. We are not prepared at present to say that any such increase is desirable, at any rate, not a retrospective [illegible] was suggested in last Saturday's LAW TIMES, under the head 'Legal Protective Association,' that 'one of the proposed alterations the association intends to advocate is a diminution of the annual certificate, and an increase of the admission stamp duty.' Now I submit that the latter will fall very hard upon many of the clerks already articled, who have, in addition to the article stamp, a heavy premium to pay, and who no doubt were articled with the idea that they would have no more to pay on admission than had been paid for many years previously. Would it not be better and more conducive to the interests of the Profession generally to increase the amount of the article stamp, or increase the admission duty upon such who are articled after such increase will take place? then they who are articled will know what they have to pay on the outset. Believe me, I do not write this from any interested or selfish motive, but because I know there are many who are now articled who really cannot afford to pay any increase of duty, and it would be hard when a young man has toiled away his five years in an attorney's office, expecting to pass by paying the usual fees, that his prospects should suddenly be ruined and blighted, and that not arising from any fault of his own, but because he cannot pay a certain sum more than he has been led to expect he would have to pay."

"AN ATTORNEY'S CLERK" (Wells), after thanking us for the hint thrown out in our last number upon the weekly half-holiday, wishes to draw the attention of those who are inclined to consider the subject to the fact, that as a rule it can hardly be doubted that the clerks suffer severely in their bodily health and strength from the continued sedentary employment, and the badness of the ventilation in many offices. We intended only to lay down the principle, and to give an example of it being carried into practice, feeling satisfied that if we could once rouse the attention of the "employers," their good feeling and good sense would soon enable them to discover the mode of lessening the evil.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 28, 1844.

THE BAR AND THE CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.

THE last week has been an eventful one for the Legal Profession. The proceedings that have taken place at the Central Criminal Court and the Middlesex Sessions are fraught with most important results. They involve in their indirect bearings nothing less than the character of the whole Profession,—the character of the Bar, the character of Attorneys. Let us calmly state the facts as they have been circulated from one end of the kingdom to the other. On Saturday the 21st, in the course of a trial at the Central Criminal Court, it transpired that the prosecutor had instructed his counsel, Mr. Crouch, himself, without the intervention of any attorney. The Common Serjeant expressed his surprise at such an unusual proceeding. Mr. Crouch asserted that it was usual in that court. Mr. Ballantine stated that he never knew of an instance of a brief being taken for a prosecution in that manner. Mr. Wilkins denied the existence of such a practice in most positive terms, and commented severely upon the conduct of Mr. Crouch. The Common Serjeant considered "it to be of all disgraceful cases the most disgraceful." A few days pass, and we find it distinctly stated by Mr. Crouch, and also by Mr. Horry, and not yet denied by any of the leading counsel in that court, neither by Mr. Adolphus, Mr. Prendergast, nor Mr. Clarkson, that such is the practice at the Central Criminal Court and at the London Sessions, and that it has been so for a long time. Mr. Ballantine, then, was mistaken; Mr. Wilkins was ignorant; the Common Serjeant knew not of the practice going on continually in his own court. We believe that this was so, but we equally believe that the practice existed, and we only believe that they were ignorant, because they say so. Mr. Horry and Mr. Pyke were also attacked at the Middlesex Sessions for having acted, one as junior in his own case, and the other as senior in the same case, without any attorney having been engaged. Mr. Serjeant Adams was astounded at the degradation of the Profession. It turns out (see the letters of Mr. Pyke and Mr. Horry) that there was an attorney engaged.

Here is strange contradiction! Great waste of virtuous indignation! But let our readers observe well that the practice is admitted. In justice to Mr. Crouch, then, we are bound to say that he has been the victim of the ignorance of those who attacked him. Regretting that hard words should have been thus bandied about on insufficient reasons, we cannot help being glad at the result.

It is now fairly stated to the world that practices unrecognized by the Bar have existed and do exist to a great extent at the Old Bailey. The world also knows, and long has known, that "An Old Bailey Practitioner" is a byword for disgrace and infamy. To what other cause can this popular opinion, be it truth or fallacy, be traced?

We doubt not, that if the system carried on at the Old Bailey were thoroughly examined and searchingly scrutinized, not only the practice already condemned, and which we unhesitatingly condemn, but many others, equally injurious and degrading, would be brought to light. Are there not a few agents with no pretence to the title of attorneys, who pilfer the prisoners, and select the counsel most pleasing to themselves? Are not prisoners' briefs constantly received without attorneys? We doubt not that some members of that Bar could be found willing to give the fullest information upon the subject; men who have unwillingly followed in the stream, because they found it hopeless to resist it; and the Bar must take it up for their own sakes. If no steps are adopted by the Seniors, they will be supposed to approve of it. Let the task be entered upon in earnest. Let the practices, equally discreditable, and not more difficult to discover, existing on several of the Circuits, be exposed, condemned, and made to cease. For what have the Benchers the power of dis-barring? For what is the bar-mess on Circuit? Can any one doubt that a resolute front shewn by the influential members of the Profession would put a stop to these evils? They must not be content with not being guilty of them themselves, but be active in preventing and punishing others. They will find the great mass of the attorneys most willing to second their efforts. No one who reflects does not see that neither part of the Profession can be lowered in the opinion of the world without also lowering the other; the dignity, honour, and character of both are inseparably united. We do not venture to suggest the plan that should be pursued—whether the existing machinery is sufficient, or whether a Council of Discipline should be established, is matter of grave consideration. We wish only to express our sense of the importance of something being done. We do, however, say that, if the charges brought against Mr. Pyke be true, into which we do not at present enter, he ought not for one single Term longer to remain a member of the Bar.

LAW SOCIETIES.

We announce with much pleasure that a meeting of the members and deputations from the principal Law Societies will take place in the month of January next at Manchester. We hope that the effect of the advertisement in our columns of this day will be, that all the Law Societies who have not declared their intention of joining in the proposed meeting will forthwith do so, and that we shall soon be able to inform our readers that all the Societies, without exception, will be represented on that occasion. Long before that period the "Legal Protective Association" will have made their rules, and their intended system of operation known, and nothing would give us greater pleasure than to find that that meeting should be chosen as the fittest opportunity of forming a strict alliance, offensive and defensive, between the provincial societies and their metropolitan brother; each reserving to themselves their full independence of judgment upon particular questions, but all agreed in certain main principles of action, and certain well-defined objects for their exertions.

We may here mention, that we have reason to know that the proceedings of one of the sham solicitors who has often been noticed in our columns will come under the searching scrutiny of the committee of the Legal Protective Association immediately upon their permanent establishment.

PRACTICE—PLEADING—EVIDENCE.

By Professor Carey.

Delivered at University College, London.

LECTURE XI.

There are two descriptions of pleas, one which denies the previous statement, and the other which, admitting the previous statement, adds to it a new statement to alter the effect of it—a plea by way of confession and avoidance. This is a plea which admits the facts stated in the declaration, but alleges some new fact to shew that the plaintiff has no right of action. For instance, in an action of debt, the plaintiff alleges that the defendant owes him 20*l.* for goods sold and delivered, the defendant pleads infancy—that he was under age when the goods were sold to him. That is a plea in which the defendant admits the sale and delivery of the goods, but alleges an excuse; that is to say, he avoids the effect of it by stating that he was an infant—which deprives the plaintiff of his right to recover. So if in an action on a bond duress is pleaded, that is a plea which admits that the defendant did execute the bond in question, but that he did it under compulsion. Again, in trespass vi et armis for an assault, the defendant may plea son assault demesne; he says, "True, I did strike plaintiff, but he struck me first, and I struck him in self-defence: the assault was his." All these pleas shew that, admitting the facts stated in the declaration to be true, yet the circumstances are such that the plaintiff had not, from the beginning, any right of action against the defendant. Take the case of a bond executed by compulsion—by duress; the bond is, primâ facie, binding on the defendant, but he pleads that the circumstances under which it was made were such that, from the beginning, it was not binding on him. In other cases, a plea by way of confession and avoidance admits that there was once a right of action, but brings forward some fact to shew that this right of action has ceased; as where, in an action of debt, the defendant pleads that he has paid the money which he owed, and therefore satisfied the claim; and in an action of debt on a bond, he might plead that the plaintiff has released him from the liability. In debt on a simple contract, or in debitatus assumpsit, a defendant may plead a set-off; for instance, admitting that he owed the plaintiff 20*l.* but also alleging that he had supplied the plaintiff with goods to the amount of 20*l.*: in these cases there was a cause of action once existing, but it is now satisfied. I do not know that you will find anywhere the line drawn exactly as I have drawn it, but I believe it is a proper one, and in a recent case to which I have referred, in which the distinction was lost sight of by the Court of Queen's Bench, the judgment of that Court was reversed by the Court of Exchequer Chamber. The difference between a plea in justification or excuse on the one hand, and a plea in discharge on the other, appears to be, whether the plea does or does not admit that there was once a right of action in the plaintiff.

A plea by way of confession and avoidance necessarily introduces some new matter to obviate the legal effect of the facts admitted. (Stephen, 199.) The truth of this new matter may be disputed by the other party; in this case it is necessary, if the matter is affirmative, that the party who introduced it should be prepared to prove it, which he undertakes to do by concluding with a verification: this is necessary to be introduced whenever affirmative matter is introduced. A plea by way of confession and avoidance admits the cause of action; it admits that there is a colourable claim, but undertakes to shew that it is only colourable. This is called giving colour. Payment gives colour completely, and there is necessarily an admission of the debt; and it is a general rule of pleading, that, where you justify, there should be an admission. (Stephen, 200 & 205.) For instance, trespass, for taking the plaintiff's sheep; plea, that "the sheep belonged to a third person, and he sold them to me, the defendant." That is a bad plea: there is no confession there of having taken the plaintiff's sheep. The defendant does, indeed, admit he took certain sheep; but he does not admit having taken the plaintiff's sheep; because, if the plea means any thing, the sheep are not the plaintiff's; and the proper way to raise the defence would be to plead that the sheep were not the plaintiff's. You will find a case involving this principle (Fletcher v. Marillier, 9 A. & E. 462), though it is rather mixed up with other circumstances, so as not to present the simple point at first sight. If the defendant confess and avoid, the plaintiff is required to reply to the plea. Wherever you confess and avoid, you introduce some new matter, which requires an answer from the other party. If, admitting the facts stated to be true, he contends that the plea constitutes no answer to the action—he demurs, i. e. he denies the matter alleged in the plea; if, on the other hand, he admits the matter alleged in the plea to be true, but avoids the effect of it by alleging some other fact, the pleadings are continued one stage further; and so they go on, until some fact is asserted on the one hand and denied on the other, unless in the meantime one of the parties has demurred.

It is a general rule that every pleading should be single; that it should consist of some one single ground, though this single ground may consist of many facts. For instance, in an action of assault the defendant may plead in justification that he was in possession of a house; that the plaintiff entered the house, and that he, the defendant, requested him to retire, and that he refused to do so, whereupon the defendant laid his hands on the plaintiff and removed him. All those several facts may be introduced in one plea, because they constitute but one defence. Then the plaintiff has, to a plea of that kind, to reply. In certain cases he can reply by denying the whole of the plea, and the most ordinary way in which this is done is by what is termed a replication de injuriâ suâ propriâ. (Stephen, 186.) The meaning of this may be explained by the following instance: the plaintiff complains of an assault committed by the defendant; the defendant says, "True, I did use some violence towards you, but you thrust yourself into my house, and I used no more than was necessary to thrust you out;" then the plaintiff replies, that the defendant exercised that violence of his own wrong, and without the excuse he has alleged; de injuriâ suâ absque tali causâ. The meaning of that plea is explained in Barnes v. Hunt (11 E. 451), which was an action of trespass quare clausum fregit, laying the trespass on several days; the defendant pleads he entered the ground by leave and license of the plaintiff, and the plaintiff replies that he did it of his own wrong, and without the cause alleged. There were three or four trespasses proved on different days, and one or two licenses, and the question was, whether pleading the license in one was not an answer to the whole action; and it was held that to a declaration of that kind, which alleged many trespasses, unless the licenses were co-extensive with the trespasses, unless every individual license was proved, or if there be any trespass in respect of which there was no license, in respect of that the plaintiff might recover. In that case absque tali causâ is "one combined thing, arising out of several facts;" and, said Lord Ellenborough, "I will venture to translate that word in this case into what it really means, and that is, without the matter of excuse alleged. Now what is the matter of excuse alleged? The defendant, in answer to a declaration complaining of several trespasses committed by him on the 1st of September, and on divers other days and times between that day and the day of exhibiting the bill, says that, at the said several days and times, when, &c. he had the license of the plaintiff; not a license to commit one or more trespasses, but a license, as large as the declaration, to commit as many trespasses as the plaintiff has assigned, and is able to prove." This replication has long been in use, particularly in actions of trespass, and trespass on the case, and also in replevin. There is a case in Selby, Entries, 429 (Walker v. Turner), in which such a plea was used. (See also Selby v. Bardons, 3 B. & A. 2.) This case was brought into a court of error (9 Bing. 756). There are some modifications to the right of pleading this; these depend on certain resolutions in Crogate's case (8 Coke, 67). It was an action of trespass against Robert Marys for driving his cattle away, and the defendant pleaded "that a house and two acres in Bassingham, in the said county, were parcel of the manor of Thoregaton, in the same county, and demised and demisable, by copy and in fee-simple, and according to the custom of the manor of which William, late Bishop of Norwich, was seized in fee in the right of his bishopric, and prescribed to have common pasture for him and his customary tenants of the said house and two acres of land, in magnâ peciâ pasturæ vocat Bassingham Common, pro omnibus averiis, &c. omni tempore anni, and the said bishop at such courts, and granted the said house and two acres by copy to one William Marys, to him and his heirs," &c. The plaintiff replied de injuriâ suâ propriâ absque tali causâ, and on demurrer the replication was held to be bad. Then came the resolutions, and in this case divers points were reserved. There is one where the plea alleges matter in excuse; it is a proper form of replying if the plea alleges matter in discharge. For instance, in an action of slander, if the plaintiff justifies the words, and says they were true, the plaintiff may reply that he did it of his own wrong, without such cause, i. e. without the justification alleged. See Craft v. Boite (1 William's Saunders, 241), in which the defendant called Craft "a thievish rogue." The defendant admits that he did use the words. Then the replication is, that he did it of his own wrong, without such cause as is by him, the said defendant, alleged; that he asserted and proclaimed of the said plaintiff the said words in the declaration specified, that is to say, "Look, there is a young thievish rogue, he hath stolen two hundred pounds' worth of plate," &c. That is an instance in which the plea is a good one. A man uses words that were slanderous, and imputes felony to another; the defendant justifies by saying he is a felon, and did commit the felony wherewith he charged him, and the plaintiff replies he did it of his own wrong, without the matter of excuse alleged. It is matter of excuse which, if proved, makes the statement such that no right of action existed from the beginning; but where the matter is in discharge of a cause of action that has once arisen, then it is not a good plea. We now come to the resolution in Crogate's case. It was a case in which the complaint was against a commoner, that he had turned off the cattle of the plaintiff, and it was held that the plea of absque tali causâ was no plea in itself. In this case, if the plea could have been allowed, it would have been necessary to have gone through the title, and to have shewn that the person complaining was entitled to the common; that he had given an order, and that, under that order, the cattle had been driven off; but, "in false imprisonment, if the defendant justifies by a capias and a warrant to him, then de injuriâ suâ propriâ is no good replication, for then the matter of record will be parcel of the cause (for all makes but one cause), and matter of record ought not to be put in issue to the common people; but in such case he may reply de injuriâ suâ propriâ, and traverse the warrant, which is matter of fact."

The plaintiff brings an action against a man for false imprisonment; he says—"True, I did arrest you;" and then he sets out the proceedings in a certain cause under which a capias issued; that the capias was directed to the sheriff, who granted the warrant under which he arrested him. Now, to that plea you cannot reply de injuriâ, because you mix up the question of whether that was a writ or not, with the rest of the matter; the rest of the matter itself would be tried by a jury. But, whether there was a writ of capias or not would be put in issue by the plea nul tiel record, which is not an issue tried by a jury, but by the Court itself. "But in such a case," says Lord Coke, "you may reply de injuriâ suâ propriâ absque tali causâ, and traverse the warrant which is matter of fact." It is, perhaps, not quite clear at first sight what is the meaning of that till you look at the old form. At the present day, if you wanted to traverse the warrant, you would do it simply without any introduction whatever; you would deny that there was any such warrant. But formerly it used to be done in a rather roundabout way, saying that "the defendant did it of his own wrong; without this, that there was a warrant." It was done in the form of a special traverse; doing it of his own wrong may be a sort of inducement, without this that there was a warrant: that is the only material part of the plea. The first resolution therefore is, that if there is matter of record, you cannot put that into the general de injuriâ but you must either traverse the record or, admitting the record, traverse the residue of the plea. Secondly, it is resolved "that when the defendant, in his own right, or as servant to another, claims any interest in the land, or any common or rent going out of the land, or any way or passage on the land, there de injuriâ suâ propriâ is generally no plea. But if the defendant justifies as servant, there de injuriâ suâ propriâ, in some of the said cases, with a traverse of the commandment, that being material, is good; and so will agree all your books." "The general plea de injuriâ suâ propriâ, &c." says Lord Coke, "is properly when the defendant's plea doth consist merely upon matter of excuse, and of no matter of interest whatsoever—et dicitur de injuriâ suâ propriâ—and because the injury properly in this sense is to the person or to the reputation, as battery or imprisonment to the person, or scandal to the reputation; there, if the defendant excuse himself upon his own assault, or upon hue and cry levied—there, properly, de injuriâ suâ propriâ generally is a good plea, for there the defendant's plea consists only upon matter of excuse."

Now we come to the third resolution:—"Resolved, that when, by the defendant's plea, any authority or power is indirectly or immediately derived from the plaintiff, there, although no interest be claimed, the plaintiff ought to answer it, and shall not reply generally de injuriâ suâ propriâ." The reason of that is said to be that both parties must be equally cognizant of the fact. I may here mention that the case quoted from 11 East was a bad instance of the replication being pleaded; it was a case in which the defendant pleaded that he committed the trespass by the leave and license of the plaintiff. The replication, to be only as it is stated in the report, is bad. It may possibly have contained a traverse of the leave and license; but if otherwise—if it is merely the plea "de injuriâ generally," as it is called by Sir E. Coke—the replication is wrong, because the defendant justifies under the plaintiff. The words of Lord Coke would seem to imply that wherever an authority is given by the law, and the defendant pleads such authority as a justification, the replication de injuriâ is bad. But that appears to be overruled; at least, the explanations of the judges are completely at variance with it. See Selby v. Bardons (3 B. & Adol. 7), and a case in Maule & Selwyn, where it says, "it is certainly stated in the third resolution in Crogate's case, that the replication de injuriâ is bad where the plea justifies under an authority in law; but this, if taken in the full extent of the terms used, is quite inconsistent with part of the first resolution, which states, that where the plea justifies under the proceedings of a court not of record, the general replication may be used; or where it justifies under a capias and warrant to sheriff, all may be traversed except the capias, which cannot, because it is matter of record, and cannot be tried by a jury."

There is also a case referred to in an argument at bar, in which Lord Holt lays it down that de injuriâ is a good replication to a plea which justifies under the authority of the law, and Mr. Justice Patteson adheres to the same doctrine in Barnwell v. Nicholson (12 A. & E. 354). Also, in the last resolution it was resolved, "That in the case at bar, the issue would be full of multiplicity of matter, where an issue ought to be full and single; for parcel of the manor, demisable by copy, grant by copy, prescription of common, and commandments, would be parcel of the issue; and so, by rule of the whole court, judgment was given against the plaintiff." This form of replication has been brought into more general use by the operation of the new rules. It has been decided that, on general principles, the pleading the replication de injuriâ suâ propriâ absque tali causâ may be admitted in an action of assumpsit, or in an action of debt, but subject to the same rules as in trespass on the case, though it is only allowable where the defendant has pleaded in justification, or excuse, and where he pleads in discharge. (Isaac v. ——, 1 M. & W. 65.) This was an action on a bill of exchange against one of the parties liable. The plea was that the signature of the party was fraudulently obtained by the money lender, and there the plea in the first instance admits the fact stated in the declaration—the making of the bill of exchange; but adds new matter to shew that the plaintiff never had any cause of action on it, because the signature was obtained by fraud. That is, therefore, a plea in excuse, not in discharge, and the replication de injuriâ may be pleaded to it; but if the plea admits that the plaintiff once had a cause of action, and then shews that it has ceased, de injuriâ is bad. For instance, in an action for goods sold and delivered, the defendant pleads a set-off; he does not deny the goods having been sold to him; he admits that, but he says that the plaintiff owes him a sum of money, which is counterbalanced by the debt for the goods. That admits the original cause of action, as stated by the plaintiff, but says, "You cannot recover, because I have an equal claim against you." There is the case of Purchell v. Salter (1 A. & E. N.S. Q.B. 197), followed by Salter v. Purchell (the same case in the Exchequer Chamber). There, the Court of Queen's Bench held, that the plea of set-off was a plea in excuse, and not a plea in discharge; on this ground, they said, it admits the debt, it does not discharge it, it only states some collateral matter, shewing a reason why the defendant is excused from paying it. It appears to me to be the established rule, that if there is a right of action once existing, any matter subsequently coming to put that right aside is matter in discharge; that the question is not, does it discharge the debt? but, does it discharge the right of action that once existed? if it does, it is a plea in discharge, and a replication de injuriâ is not good. Every plea must consist of a single ground, for if it consists of two grounds of defence, it will be held bad, for duplicity, on demurrer. So the parties must go on until they come to an issue, or unless in the meantime one of them demurs. In the next lecture will we go on to that point at which we will suppose them to demur.

Best on Presumptions of Law and Fact

The next presumption to which we have to direct attention is the rule "Omnia præsumuntur contra spoliatorem," of which we give from Mr. Best the two most striking instances:—

"One of the leading cases on the subject is that of Armory v. Delamirie (1 Strange, 505), where a person in a humble station of life having found a jewel, took it to a goldsmith's shop to inquire its value, who, having got the jewel into his possession under pretence of weighing it, took out the stone, and on the finder refusing to accept a small sum for it, returned to him the empty socket. An action of trover having been brought to recover damages for the detention of the stone, Pratt, C. J. directed the jury that, unless the defendant produced the jewel, and shewed it not to be of the finest water, they should presume the strongest against him, and make the value of the best jewels the measure of their damages. So, in the recent case of Mortimer v. Craddock (12 Law J. N.S. 166, C. P.), which was an action of trover for a necklace, consisting of several diamonds, which had been unlawfully taken out of the owner's possession; and some of the diamonds were seen shortly afterwards in the possession of the defendant, who could give no satisfactory account how he came by them. On this it was held that the jury might fairly be directed to presume that the whole set of diamonds had come to the defendant's hands, and that the full value of the whole was the proper measure of damages."

The most familiar application of this principle is when there has been any malpractice in judicial proceedings—as by removing or destroying documents, and other testimony, &c. which not only raises a presumption against the party removing, &c. but procures more ready admission to the evidence on the other side; and it casts suspicion on all other evidence of the wrong-doer.

The next class of presumptions is that of those derived from the general character, disposition, and conduct of the parties to judicial proceedings. These are too well known to need repetition.

The proof of handwriting is the subject of the ninth chapter. This is either direct, by the attestation of an eye-witness, or presumptive, by resemblance, &c.

"Abstractedly considered, it is clear that this judgment may be formed by one or more of the following means:—1st, A standard of the general character of the handwriting of any person may be formed in the mind by having on former occasions observed the letters traced by him while in the act of writing, with which standard the handwriting in the disputed document may, by a mental operation, be compared. 2ndly, A person who has never seen the supposed author of a document write, may obtain a like standard by means either of having carried on written correspondence with him, or having had other opportunities of observing writing which there is reasonable ground for presuming to be his. 3rdly, A judgment as to the genuineness of the handwriting to a document may be formed by a comparison instituted between it and other documents known or admitted to be of the handwriting of the party. These three modes of proof, the admissibility and weight of which we propose to consider in their order, have been accurately designated the præsumptio ex visu scriptionis; præsumptio ex scriptis olim visis; and præsumptio ex comparatione scriptorum, seu ex scripto nunc viso (3 Benth. Jud. Ev. 598, 599)."

One of the questions arising in this branch of the treatise—viz. as to the proof of handwriting by the knowledge acquired from specimens—has been carefully examined by Mr. Best; and as it has recently undergone a complete investigation by the Courts, we extract the passage:—

"The next question connected with this subject is also one which has caused considerable difference of opinion, namely, whether it is allowable to prove the handwriting of a party to a modern document by the testimony of a witness whose judgment as to the character of the handwriting has been formed from specimens admitted to be genuine, and shewn to him with a view of enabling him to form such opinion. In Stanger v. Searle (1 Esp. 14), where the question turned on the genuineness of the handwriting on a bill of exchange, purporting to have been accepted by the defendant, a witness was called, who stated that he had seen the defendant write on several occasions before the trial, he having written in the presence of the witness purposely that he might be enabled to distinguish his handwriting from that on the bill. The evidence of this witness was rejected by Lord Kenyon, as the defendant might, through design, write his name differently from his common mode of writing. And in the subsequent case of Allesbrook v. Roach (1 Esp. 351), the same learned judge allowed the jury to compare a suspected signature with one admitted to be authentic, but not evidence in the cause, although he refused to allow a witness to state his judgment of the handwriting founded on such comparison; and similar evidence was also rejected by Lord Tenterden in Clermont v. Tullidge (4 C. & P. 1). But the whole subject has since undergone a complete investigation in the case of Doe dem. Mudd v. Suckermore (5 A. & E. 703; 2 N. & P. 16), which is the leading case on the rules of evidence respecting handwriting. In that case, the question turned on the due execution of a will, and the three attesting witnesses were called. It was supposed that S. one of them, was deceived in swearing to his own attestation, and that, although he had attested a will for the testator, the document produced was a forgery. On his cross-examination, two signatures, purporting to be his, and to have been subscribed to depositions made by him in certain other proceedings, and also sixteen or eighteen signatures, apparently his, were admitted by him to be in his handwriting. The cause lasted more than one day, and on a day subsequent to that of the examination of S. another witness was called, who had no other knowledge of him or of the character of his handwriting than from an examination during the trial of the admitted signatures. This second witness, it is to be observed, was an inspector of powers of attorney at the Bank, whose whole duty was to compare the signatures to powers of attorney with former signatures made by the parties, and who stated that from the inspection he had made of the signatures of S. in the actual case, he was able to form a judgment as to his handwriting on the supposed will. This evidence was objected to as being proof of handwriting by comparison, and as such rejected by Vaughan, J.; and the judges of the Court of Queen's Bench, after hearing the question fully argued, on a rule for a new trial, differing in opinion, proceeded to give judgment separately.

"Lord Denman, C. J. and Williams, J. thought the evidence receivable, and argued as follows:—Admitting the existence of the rule excluding proof of handwriting by comparison—concerning the abstract propriety of which much doubt might exist—the present case did not fall strictly within it; and a rule so objectionable in principle ought not to be extended by construction or inference. No difference in principle existed between the present case and those of Sainsbury v. Smith (5 C. & P. 196); Earl Ferrars v. Shirley (Fitzg. 195), and others, where witnesses were allowed to form their opinion of handwriting from correspondence, or having casually seen the handwriting of the party. The witness here appeared, not in the light of an ordinary person (as in R. v. Cator, 4 Esp. 117), called on to place the doubtful papers in juxtaposition, and so compare them, but of a scientific individual, called on to give to the jury the benefit of his skill; in which case Burr v. Harper (Holt, N. P. C. 42), and the numerous cases relative to the proof of ancient documents, shewed that the recency of the period when his knowledge of the handwriting was acquired could make no difference. But even supposing this evidence were to be considered equivalent to a comparison of handwriting, still the reasons for objecting to it as such would not apply in the present case, for the documents having been admitted by the first witness to be of his handwriting, no collateral issue could be raised upon them; which distinguished the case from that of Stanger v. Searle (1 Esp. 14), and brought it within that of Allesbrook v. Roach (1 Esp. 351). Patteson and Coleridge, JJ. on the other hand, thought the evidence rightly rejected. It differed from knowledge of handwriting obtained by correspondence, &c. in this essential point, namely, the undesignedness of the manner in which, in the latter case, the knowledge is obtained. In such cases the letters from which the opinion of the witness is formed are letters written in the course of business, without reference to their serving as evidence for a collateral purpose in future proceedings. It was [illegible] in argument at the bar to have been the uniform practice for many years to reject such evidence as this, and rightly so, for it was in substance a proof of handwriting by comparison; and with respect to the fact of the first witness having admitted the genuineness of the specimens, it would be highly dangerous to allow parties to the suit to be bound by admissions of that nature. As to Allesbrook v. Roach (1 Esp. 351), it must be considered as overruled by Doe dem. Parry v. Newton (5 A. & E. 514; 1 Nev. & Per. 1); and with respect to Burr v. Harper (Holt, N. P. C. 420), [illegible] of that decision was at least questionable, [illegible] was never brought under review, the verdict [illegible] against the party in whose favour it was made. They considered Stanger v. Searle (1 Esp. 14), and Clermont v. Tullidge (4 C. & P. 1), as authorities in point.

"The Court being thus equally divided in opinion, the rule for a new trial was of course discharged; and it may be fairly observed, that, as it has been hitherto the admitted practice to reject this kind of proof, the onus of proving its admissibility, consistently with the received principles of evidence, seems to lie on those who seek to introduce it.

"Two cases bearing on this subject have occurred since Doe dem. Mudd v. Suckermore: [illegible] Griffits v. Ivery (11 A. & E. 322), and Hughes v. Rogers (8 M. & W. 123). In the former case, the defendant, to negative the genuineness of the acceptance of a bill of exchange, called witnesses, who deposed that they were acquainted with his handwriting, and did not believe the acceptance to be his. The plaintiff's counsel then proposed, on cross-examination, to lay before them a paper, purporting to be signed by the defendant, and to ask whether they believed the signature to be that of the defendant, for the purpose of testing their knowledge of his handwriting by the agreement or disagreement of their testimony on this point. Lord Denman, C.J. who tried the case, held that the paper could not be shewn to the witnesses, unless it were already made relevant and evidence in the cause, or unless it was proved by independent evidence to have been written by the defendant, and this ruling was confirmed on motion for a new trial by the Court of Queen's Bench, consisting of Littledale, Coleridge, JJ. and Lord Denman, C.J. who added, that the latter part of his ruling could not be sustained, and that if the paper even had been proved by independent evidence to have been written by the defendant, it would not have rendered the question regular. That case was followed by Hughes v. Rogers, where a witness, called by the plaintiff to prove the signature of an attesting witness to a bond, said it was not in his handwriting; whereupon the counsel for the plaintiff put into his hands another paper, not in evidence in the cause, which the witness also declared was not the handwriting of the attesting witness. The plaintiff's counsel then proposed to call witnesses to prove that this second paper had been actually signed by the attesting witness in their presence. This evidence was rejected by Coleridge, J. as tending to raise a collateral issue; and this ruling was confirmed by the Court of Exchequer, Parke, B. in the course of his judgment, referring to Griffits v. Ivery, and stating that he had himself, in a recent case, acted in conformity with that decision."

Here we break off, purposing to resume as leisure may permit.

TO THE LEGAL PROFESSION AND ALL WHO WISH TO SECURE THEIR WRITINGS AGAINST FRAUD.

STEPHENS'S RECORD WRITING FLUID.—This Writing Fluid has been examined at the Royal Institution of Great Britain, by one of the first Chemists of this country, there is no article which combines so effectually the power of resisting chemical agents washing damp friction and time. It has more of the character of Printing Ink, made fluid, than of common Writing Ink, its basis being carbon, it is indestructible, except by fire. It dries with a gloss and follows every movement of the pen with the greatest facility. As it flows more freely than common Ink it requires for fine writing a finely pointed pen. For Records it realizes what has long been hoped for—namely, a durability equal to printing. Broad-nibbed pens for full large writing will not be required to the same extent for this article. It has no action whatever upon steel pens. Carbon not being a soluble matter, has a tendency slowly to subside, the necessity of occasionally shaking the Inkholder is, therefore apparent. The Inkholders contrived by me are best adapted for the use of this article.

N.B. This Ink writes more agreeably after it has been a day or two in use.

Hard, well-sized paper should be chosen, as soft, flowy, absorbent papers cause it to work with too thick a stroke. It is admirably adapted to rapid writing.

Sold in Bottles at 3d 6d 1s, and 3s each, by Booksellers and Stationers, and by the Inventor, HENRY STEPHENS 54, Stamford-street, Blackfriars-road, London.

MANCHESTER LAW ASSOCIATION.—At a numerous Meeting of the Committee of the Manchester Law Association, held at their rooms, 23, Princess-street, on the 28th of March 1844 the Honorary Secretary having read a letter from Thomas Hodgson, Esq. Secretary to the Yorkshire Law Society, and inclosing a copy of Resolutions passed at a General Meeting of that Society held on the 15th of March last, to the effect, viz.

"That in order to resist the various attempts constantly being made to centralize the business of the Legal Profession in the metropolis continual exertion and watchfulness on the part of the country Solicitors is required and some permanent union between the different Law Societies in the country is very desirable. That the Secretary communicate with the Manchester Law Association, and the other Societies urging the importance of a union of this description, with a view to mutual co-operation on all matters of general importance to the Profession.

"That Manchester, on account of the facility of communication between that town and the different parts of the kingdom, and the activity and efficiency of its present Law Association, be recommended as the place of union, and that it be also recommended that representatives from the various Law Societies meet there annually."

Resolved unanimously.

That this Committee entirely concur in the above resolutions, and pledge themselves to render every assistance in their power in endeavouring to effect a permanent union between the different provincial Law Societies.

That should Manchester be selected as the place for the Annual Meetings of the Representatives of the various Law Societies this Committee will use every exertion to render such meetings effective for the important objects sought to be accomplished.

That the Honorary Secretary be requested to write to Mr. Hodgson, with a copy of the above Resolutions.

That the above Resolutions be advertised in the LAW TIMES.

It is to be noted that the Policies of this Company will cover Voyages of every description, and Service in every part of the Globe.

The Lives of Fishermen and Boatmen also Insured.

High rates of Premium have hitherto operated against this kind of Assurance, but as the scale now adopted will be found as low as is consonant with the risk, it is believed that this fact, coupled with the advantages, will induce a great increase of Insurers.

Deferred Annuities to Mariners granted upon very moderate premiums.

The Premiums for GENERAL ASSURANCES are based upon a new and adjusted Table of Mortality.

Ten per Cent. of the Profits to be applied in making provision for Destitute and Disabled Mariners.

CHOICE of a SERVANT.—DOMESTIC BAZAAR, 326, Oxford-street, corner of Regent's-circus, established 1830.—Families in want of good Servants will decidedly find their interest consulted by applying at the Bazaar, as domestics are waiting to be hired from ten to five, and to insure giving satisfaction, none but those of the best description are suffered to attend. The subscriber may select any servant likely to suit, who refers to the family with whom she last lived; and should inquiries not prove satisfactory, they may select others. This thoroughly straightforward method has been found to give universal satisfaction, and the farce of applying to tradespeople, and waiting an indefinite period, is therefore obviated, as at this establishment a respectable servant can be procured immediately. Fee for one servant, 2*s.* 6*d.*; for as many as may be required, 14*s.* per annum.

It is provided by the Constitution of the Society, that the insured shall be free from all responsibility, and to guarantee the engagements of the Office, a fund of 550,000*l*. has been subscribed by a numerous and opulent proprietary. Returns are periodically made to parties insuring.

The business of the Society exceeds Fifty-eight Millions. The duty paid to Government for the year 1842 was 68,642*l*. 14*s*. 3*d*., and the amount insured on Farming Stock was upwards of Nine Millions and a Half.

This Society has been established upwards of 34 years; all just demands upon its funds have been promptly and liberally settled; nearly two millions and a half have been thus paid away on expired policies; and to meet the existing engagements of the Institution, it possesses funds amounting to upwards of a million and three-quarters, almost wholly invested on real and Government securities.

The Rates of Premium are BELOW those of most other Offices, and, under the age of 45, not less so than ten per cent.—a benefit in itself equivalent to an annual bonus; whilst periodical additions are also made to the sums assured upon all policies for the whole duration of life, in proportion to the amount of premium paid; the full advantage of Life Assurance is thus enjoyed by the members of this Institution.

The subjoined List of some of the existing Policies of the Society exhibits the aggregate amount of Bonus assigned to each of those Policies, including that declared at the General Meeting held on the 9th of September, 1842.

STEPHENS'S RECORD WRITING

FLUID.—This Writing Fluid has been examined at the Royal Institution of Great Britain, by one of the first Chemists of this country; there is no article which combines so effectually the power of resisting chemical agents, washing, damp, friction, and time. It has more of the character of Printing Ink, made fluid, than of common Writing Ink: its basis being carbon, it is indestructible, except by fire. It dries with a gloss, and follows every movement of the pen with the greatest facility. As it flows more freely than common Ink, it requires for fine writing, a finely pointed pen. For Records, it realizes what has long been hoped for—namely, a durability equal to printing. Broad-nibbed pens for full large writing, will not be required to the same extent for this article. It has no action whatever upon steel pens. Carbon not being a soluble matter, has a tendency slowly to subside; the necessity of occasionally shaking the Inkholder is, therefore, apparent. The Inkholders contrived by me are best adapted for the use of this article.

N.B. This Ink writes more agreeably after it has been a day or two in use.

[illegible] should be chosen; as soft, flocky, absorbent papers cause it to write with too thick a stroke. It is admirably adapted to rapid writing.

Sold in Bottles, at 6*d*. 9*d*. 1*s*. and 2*s*. each, by Booksellers and Stationers, and by the Inventor, HENRY STEPHENS, 54, Stamford-street, Blackfriars-road, London.

THIS IS THE ONLY COMPANY who are bound by their deed of constitution not to dispute any Policy, unless they can prove that it was obtained by fraudulent misrepresentation; the great aim and object of the Society having been to render Life Policies COMPLETE SECURITIES and NEGOTIABLE DOCUMENTS, which shall owe their value to the certainty of the contracts upon which they are founded, and be independent of the liberality or caprice of those who shall be in the management of the affairs of the Company when the claims arise; and for this purpose the Company have, by a clause in their deed of constitution, unhesitatingly deprived themselves of the power of objecting to any policy, unless they undertake to prove that it was obtained from them by fraudulent misrepresentation. The regulations common to all other Life Companies, which make the validity of assurance contracts dependent upon the perfect correctness of the many statements required from a proposer for a Life Policy, and which have given rise to almost all the questions which have been argued in the courts, and to many extra-judicial compromises, are thus entirely abrogated; and nothing but fraud, proved to have been committed against them, can vitiate a policy granted by this Company.

THIS IS THE ONLY COMPANY from whom the assured, on the mutual principle, receive the whole of the mutual accumulations, and also a guarantee from the Shareholders for the sums assured.

THIS IS THE ONLY COMPANY who bind themselves to pay the sums in the Policies, although the debts for which they were effected shall have been liquidated before the claims arise; the Company considering it only just towards the assured, that where premiums have been received for assuring a given amount, that amount should be paid when it becomes due, without dispute or deduction; and they undertake to do so without reference to the state of the accounting between the assured and his debtor.

THIS IS ALMOST THE ONLY COMPANY who grant in favour of creditors whole world Policies, whereby the debt is secured, although the debtor should go beyond the limits of Europe.

The premiums, calculated according to the Carlisle tables, are lower than usual upon young lives, where participation in the profits is not required; and for short assurances, which, at the option of the assured, may be continued for life, the rates are as low as a due regard to complete security will permit.

TRIENNIAL ASCENDING SCALE TO ASSURE £100.

BY THE HALF-PREMIUM PLAN, only one-half of the premium for the first seven years is required, the other half being payable at the convenience of the assured; thus allowing a Policy to be continued for seven years at one-half of the usual rate, or to be dropped at one-half of the usual sacrifice, and entitling the assured, seven years hence, when loss of health may prevent him from effecting a new assurance, to continue a Policy at a rate of premium applicable to an age seven years younger. The Half-premium plan of assurance, as practised by this Company, thus enables persons to retain to their own use the one-half of the premiums for the first seven years, at 5*l*. per cent. interest. Thus, suppose the ordinary premium for an assurance of 500*l*. to be 10*l*., the first payment by the half-premium plan will be five guineas, being the one-half of the 10*l*., and interest for the retained half; and, if death should occur in the first year, the sum of 500*l*. would be paid less the 5*l*. retained. The assured may thus have the use for the first year of 5*l*.; for the second of 10*l*.; and so on till the end of the seventh year, when the retained sums, amounting to 35*l*., may either be repaid, or retained at 5*l*. per cent. interest until death, when the 35*l*. would be subtracted from the 500*l*. then payable by the Company.

HIGHLY VALUABLE & DESIRABLE ESTATE, at RYTON-UPON-DUNSMORE, in the county of Warwick.—To be SOLD by AUCTION by Mr. JOHN MOORE, on Friday, May 3, 1844, at four o'clock in the afternoon, at the King's Head Hotel, in the city of Coventry, in one or more lots, as may be agreed upon at the time of sale, and subject to such conditions as shall be then and there produced, all that most eligible farm and farm-house, with the barns, cowsheds, stables, outbuildings, and appurtenances, known as the Prebend Rectory, or Parsonage of Rinton, otherwise Ryton, with the lands thereto belonging, comprising a compact estate of about 362 acres, consisting of very fertile arable, meadow, and pasture la[illegible], occupied under a twenty-one years lease from the Prebendary of Ryton, subject to the tenant right of renewal, together with all hereditaments and advantages to the estate belonging. The whole estate is situate in the parish of Ryton-upon-Dunsmore, distant about four miles from the city of Coventry, and about eight miles from the fashionable spa of Leamington; the contiguity to which towns, the London and Birmingham railroad and neighbouring canals, as well as the Holyhead-road, passing through the property, afford excellent facilities for the sale of produce and purchase of manure.

The principal portion of the arable land is a fine sandy loam, and the meadows adjoining the river Avon are capable of complete irrigation at proper seasons.

The estate is subject to certain rents and reservations of small amount, which, with the annual payment by way of fine on renewal, will be fully explained at the time of sale, or in printed particulars, to be circulated previous to the sale.

To capitalists, or for occupation, this estate presents peculiar advantages. It is situated in a fine hunting district, and combines within itself the uninterrupted right of sporting, with great facilities for preserving game, as well as the right of fishery in the river Avon, which, to a considerable extent, bounds the property.

The estate may be viewed on application to Mr. WILLIAM KELLAM, of Ryton-upon-Dunsmore, who will shew plans and furnish particulars; and any further information may be obtained on application to Mr. JOHN BURBURY, of Leek Wootton Grange, near Kenilworth, Warwickshire; Mr. THOMAS POTTER BURBURY, Solicitor, Birmingham, and his Agents, Messrs. This Society has been formed for the purpose of assisting the amendment of the Law, and improving the administration of justice. Although great alterations have been recently made in many departments of the Law, it is admitted that both the Law itself and the mode of its administration are still capable of improvement.

The Society is fully impressed with the conviction, that any further alteration should be made with the utmost caution and circumspection. But it is of the utmost importance to the community, that safe and expedient alterations in the Law should be proposed and investigated; that all information as to them should be brought before the legislature and the public, and that they should be encouraged and supported by all legitimate means.

It has therefore been thought useful, that an Association should be established (without reference to any political party) to assist and carry forward these great objects. It seemed most proper that it should be commenced by persons acquainted with the administration of the law in various departments. But, in addition to the present members, the co-operation, not only of other Members of Parliament and of the Legal Profession, but of all other classes, and more especially of the trading and mercantile classes, is earnestly invited. The principal objects of the Society will be—

1st. To bring into co-operation individuals who have already taken, or desire to take, active steps towards the amendment of the law, and thus render their efforts more systematic and effectual.

2nd. To collect and diffuse information with a view to the objects of the Society.

3rd. To undertake a communication with the proper authorities in foreign countries, on subjects connected with the amendment of the law. And

4th. To publish from time to time, under the sanction of the Society, such suggestions as may seem to deserve more than ordinary consideration.

Communications may be addressed to Lord BROUGHAM, at No. 4, Grafton-street; or to the Treasurer, JAMES STEWART, Esq. No. 13, Southwick-crescent, Hyde-park; or to the Honorary Secretary, WILLIAM VIZARD, No. 16, New-street, Spring-gardens; or to any other Member of the Society.

THE MARINERS' AND GENERAL LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANY.

ESTABLISHED EXPRESSLY FOR INSURANCES ON THE LIVES OF MARINERS

(Whether Members of the Royal or Mercantile Navy,)

MILITARY MEN and GENERAL ASSURERS.

It is to be noted that the Policies of this Company will cover Voyages of every description, and Service in every part of the Globe.

The Lives of Fishermen and Boatmen also Insured.

High rates of Premium have hitherto operated against this kind of Assurance, but as the scale now adopted will be found as low as is consonant with the risk, it is believed that this fact, coupled with the advantages, will induce a great increase of Insurers.

Deferred Annuities to Mariners granted upon very moderate premiums.

The Premiums for GENERAL ASSURANCES are based upon a new and adjusted Table of Mortality.

Ten per Cent. of the Profits to be applied in making provision for Destitute and Disabled Mariners.

PRIVATE WRONGS, and their REMEDIES, being the Third Book of Blackstone's Commentaries, incorporating the alterations down to the present time.

Second Edition, revised and greatly enlarged.

By JAMES STEWART, of Lincoln's Inn, esq. Barrister-at-Law.

The Editor has very readily attended to the speedy call for a second edition of the present volume, as it would seem to shew that the plan of editing it has met the approbation of the Profession. He is confirmed by it in his opinion that the more useful mode of conveying the alterations in the law to the reader, since the original work was published, is to incorporate them into the text, rather than to append them by note; but he could not be the first to offer an edition of the whole work to the Profession on this plan, without great diffidence. No one, indeed, acquainted with the recent changes in the law, can peruse this volume, without perceiving that they render it in many of its parts almost useless in its original state; and the alterations in the law, even in the last three years, have been so considerable as materially to affect many chapters. The recent Acts of Parliament, and the orders and rules founded on them, and the changes effected by both as to the courts of law and equity, and as to process and pleading (the chapters relating to which subjects are the most important in this volume), have rendered the original text almost a dead letter; and those, as it appears to the Editor, can only be given with effect by being incorporated with the text.

The Editor has, in the present edition, revised and enlarged his former labours: and he has not only added the alterations by statute and decision since its publication down to the present time; but the authorities of the original text of Blackstone have been carefully examined, and he believes they will now be found to be correct.

In the present edition of this volume the Editor has thought it consistent with his plan to give a short account of the summary or equitable jurisdiction of the courts of common law, and considerably to enlarge the concluding chapter on equity. The summary jurisdiction of courts of common law has been considerably increased; and the principles and subjects of jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery have been materially altered and extended since the period at which the commentaries were completed, and the Editor has endeavoured to present these alterations in a short, but comprehensive view, to the reader. In this edition, therefore, three new chapters are added—Chapter XIX. "On the Summary or Equitable Jurisdiction of the Courts of Common Law;" and the last chapter "Of Proceedings in the Courts of Equity," has been expanded into three—Chapter XXVIII. "Of the General Nature of Equity;" Chapter XXIX. "Of the Matters Cognizable by Courts of Equity;" and Chapter XXX. "Of Proceedings in the Courts of Equity." In all other respects the same plan has been pursued as in the former edition; the whole of the original text and arrangement being preserved, and a reference in the side margin being made to the original paging of Blackstone; by attending to which, it may easily be seen what alterations or additions have been made; and this, perhaps, may be found a useful practice for the student.

The Editor, therefore, in conclusion, trusts that this edition will not be found less useful than the last; and he can assure the reader that the bare statement of all the changes in the law has required all the care and attention in his power.

PRACTICAL RULES for DETERMINING PARTIES to ACTIONS, digested and arranged, with Cases.

By HERBERT BROOM, Of the Inner Temple, Esq. Barrister-at-Law.

"A book which will supply the mass of the Profession who are not accomplished pleaders with the information they need for the proper performance of the duty that devolves upon them previously to the employment of the pleader, without putting them to the cost of purchasing three huge volumes, of which only a few pages of the first are required for their purposes, is obviously a desideratum; and having examined Mr. Broom's publication with some attention, we may venture to assert that it does satisfactorily supply this desideratum. In arrangement it is very like the famous first chapter of Mr. Chitty; but it is much more copious. The cases are carefully brought down to the present time."—Law Times, July 29, 1843.

"It appears to be executed with care, and displays both learning and ingenuity."—Law Magazine.

"It will not only be found valuable for the purposes of reference, but the student especially will find himself amply repaid by its perusal."—The Jurist, Feb. 11.

"In our judgment the book must prove a valuable addition to the Law Library, for it compresses a large amount of knowledge, diffused over various books, and through voluminous Reports, into a reasonable compass."—The Worcestershire Chronicle, March 1.

THE MARINERS' AND GENERAL LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANY.

ESTABLISHED EXPRESSLY FOR INSURANCES ON THE LIVES OF MARINERS (Whether Members of the Royal or Mercantile Navy,) MILITARY MEN and GENERAL ASSURERS.

It is to be noted that the Policies of this Company will cover Voyages of every description, and Service in every part of the Globe.

The Lives of Fishermen and Boatmen also Insured.

High rates of Premium have hitherto operated against this kind of Assurance, but as the scale now adopted will be found as low as is consonant with the risk, it is believed that this fact, coupled with the advantages, will induce a great increase of Insurers.

Deferred Annuities to Mariners granted upon very moderate premiums.

The Premiums for GENERAL ASSURANCES are based upon a new and adjusted Table of Mortality.

Ten per Cent. of the Profits to be applied in making provision for Destitute and Disabled Mariners.

ADVANTAGES OF THIS INSTITUTION.

The whole of the profits divided annually among the holders of policies on which five annual premiums shall have been paid.

Credit given for half the amount of the first five annual premiums, by which means assurances may be effected and loans for short periods secured with the least possible present outlay, and after payment of the arrears, the policy-holder will become entitled to participate in the entire profit of this Institution, precisely in the same manner as if he had paid the whole amount of his premiums in advance in the usual way.

Thus, for example:—A person in the 25th year of his age, instead of paying 2*l*. 6s. per annum for an assurance of 100*l*. would be required to pay 1*l*. 3s. only during the first five years, when, on payment of the arrears of premium, amounting to 5*l*. 15s., his share of the profits would be such as to reduce his future annual premiums to very little more than the half-premium of 1*l*. 3s. originally paid by him. The Great Britain is the only Mutual Assurance Society in which this very great accommodation is given to the assured.

Credit allowed for the whole of the first five annual premiums, on satisfactory security being given for the payment of the same at the expiration of five years.

Transfers of policies effected and registered (without charge) at the office.

Claims on policies not subject to be litigated or disputed, except with the sanction, in each case, of a general meeting of the assured, to be specially convened on the occasion.

Holders of policies of 1,000*l*. entitled (after payment of five annual premiums) to attend and vote at all general meetings of the assured, who will have the superintendence and control of the funds and affairs of the Society.

Full particulars are detailed in the prospectus, which, with every requisite information, may be obtained by application to A. R. IRVINE, Managing Director.

A liberal commission allowed to Solicitors and Agents.

THE MONEY MARKET.

There has occurred a depreciation in the value of the English funds, since our last report, to the extent of one per cent. No satisfactory reason is assigned for this depression, which has to some extent affected both the Foreign and Share markets. The latest prices are as follows:—Consols, 99½ to ⅝; Bank Stock, 196 to 197; Exchequer Bills, 74 to 76 prem.; India Stock, 290 to 292; Three per Cents. Reduced, 98¾ to ⅞; Three-and-a-Half per Cents. Reduced, 102⅜ to ½; New Three-and-a-Half per Cents., 103 to ⅛; Long Annuities, 12 7-16; and India Bonds, 91 to 93 prem.

The most remarkable feature in the Foreign market has been a fall in Spanish and Mexican bonds. The following are the closing quotations:—Spanish Active Bonds, 24¾ to ⅞; the Three per Cents., 35⅞ to 6⅛; Deferred, 14⅞ to 15⅛: Passive, 6¼ to ⅜; Peruvian, 30 to 1; Portuguese Converted, 46 to 7; Mexican, 34¾ to 5; Deferred, 15⅛ to ¾; Danish, 88 to 9; Dutch Two-and-a-Half per Cents. 60¼ to ⅜; Dutch Fives, 100¼ to ¾; Belgian, 104 to 5; Brazilian, 80 to 1; Buenos Ayres, 36 to 8; Chilian, 102 to 4; Colombian, ex Venezuela, 14½ to ¾.

The fall in the English funds has operated unfavourably on the Share market. Sales have been few, and business flat. Subjoined are the latest prices:—London and Birmingham Shares, 227 to 9; New Quarter Shares, 26 to 7; New Thirds, 38 to 9; South Western, 83½ to 4½; Eighths, 3⅞ to 4⅛ prem.; London and Brighton, 43½ to ¾; New, 11¼ to ⅛; Blackwall, 6⅛ to ⅜; Greenwich, 5 to ½; Croydon, 17¼ to ½; Manchester and Leeds, 110 to 12; New, 47 to 8; Quarter Shares, 9 to ½; Manchester and Birmingham, 50 to 1; Birmingham and Derby, 61 to 3; Thirds, 20 to [illegible] Eighths, 4 to ½; Midland Counties, 88 to 90; North Midland, 89 to 91; Edinburgh and Glasgow, 66 to 7; New, 16¼ to ¾; Great Western, 110½ to 111½; Half Shares, 71 to 2: Fifths, 19⅛ to 20; South Eastern, 35⅝ to 6; New, 5⅛ to 6 premium; Northern and Eastern, 57 to 8; Eastern Counties, 13 to ¼; New Registered, 15 to ¼; Perpetual Five per Cents., 1⅛ to ¼ premium; Birmingham and Gloucester, 92 to 4; Hull and Selby, 59½ to 60½; Bristol and Exeter, 73¼ to 4½; Paris and Orleans, 36¼ to ⅝; Paris and Rouen, 37 to ¼; Rouen and Havre, 7¼ to ¾ prem.; Chatham and Portsmouth, 1⅛ per share; Dublin and Cashel, 5⅛; Newcastle and Darlington Junction, 42; North British, 2¾ to ⅞; Norwich and Brandon, 7⅛; York and North Midland, 116½; Half Shares, 58½; Scarborough Branch, 19½; Marseilles and Avignon, 16¾; Strasbourg and Bale, 11¼.

In Joint Stock Banks—London Joint Stock, 13⅛; London and Westminster, 25⅛; National Provincial of England, 34½ to ¾; New, 9½; Union of Australia, 26¼.

The Dwelling-house, which is very large, would be easily convertible for any Establishment where extensive in and out-door room, pure air, and a constant supply of good water, would be necessary requisites.

It is situated near the junction of the Birmingham with the London and Worcester turnpike road, and about a mile from the excellent market-town of Chipping Norton.

For further particulars apply to Mr. G. HELDER, 17, Clement's-inn, London; or Messrs. OLDAKER, WOODWARD, and BALL, Solicitors, Pershore.

MR. RAINY respectfully begs leave to acquaint the Nobility, Gentry, and the Public, that in order to meet the times, and in consequence of the pressure of Mortgages and other incumbrances upon Estates, and the various descriptions of Real Property, brought into the market for sale by Public Auction and Private Contract, it is his intention to adopt for the future a REDUCED and GRADUATED SCALE of COMMISSION, as compared with that which has been generally customary for the last half-century. At the same time that the expenses of vendors will thus be materially diminished, he trusts that he shall be able to afford greater facilities to the attainment of their objects, and to the fullest advantage: and touching these points, he feels it necessary to offer a few words of explanation.

There exists between many Solicitors and many Auctioneers, an understanding to which the epithet collusive would scarcely be too severe, because by it the interests of their clients, the vendors, is often seriously compromised, and in this manner:—The vendor, instead of himself selecting the auctioneer or agent for the disposal of his property, will, in many cases, confide the choice to his solicitor, and not unfrequently the solicitor (but upon what justifiable plea Mr. Rainy never could comprehend) arrogates to himself the right of such choice; and repeated instances might be adduced to shew that that choice has been exercised in contravention, if not in opposition to the previously-expressed wishes of the vendors, and wholly regardless of old and long-established connections; these solicitors having usually a secret compact with the auctioneer, by which he is bound to fee the solicitor with a share of his commission and other charges, as the sine qua non of his being appointed to the sale. And what is the consequence? In such quarters the auctioneer who is willing to concede to the solicitor the largest share, or, in other words, consents to pay the heaviest bribe, be, be he quack or otherwise, and with slight reference to his regular initiation into his profession, or his qualifications or experience, or (what also is evidently an essential consideration) the extent of his connections and influence, he is preferred. Thus tempted, many solicitors have become reconciled to abuse the patronage they have assumed, and aim at excluding those auctioneers who, like Mr. RAINY, have consistently and uniformly refused to submit to a tyranny subversive of all proper rivalry, and at variance with all independent and honourable feeling.

With respect, however, to what may be considered the legitimate association of the province of the Solicitor with that of the Auctioneer or public agent, Mr. RAINY, with the desire to obviate jealousies, to produce a more cordial and satisfactory co-operation between those parties, and in the hope of entirely abolishing secret and derogatory compacts, would suggest that, as a remuneration to the solicitor of the vendor, for his advice and assistance in the drawing and settling of the conditions of sale, and for his attention to those legal points which are in immediate relation with that part of the transaction, a fair portion of the commission should accrue to the solicitor (but with the full knowledge and sanction of the vendor), in lieu of the charges now made by him for the particular items adverted to. This, however, is not intended to include charges for investigations of title, abstracts, deeds, or papers, or fees to counsel; and Mr. RAINY entertains no doubt that the Nobility, Gentry, and the Public, will approve of and support the principle of repudiating altogether any clandestine dealings between parties employed in affairs so important to them. But in all cases where the vendors do not consent to the appropriation to the solicitor of such portion of the commission; or the solicitor, from that integrity, impartiality, and strict sense of justice, and that delicacy and liberal feeling which fortunately characterize the conduct of a large number of the members of the Legal Profession, declines the acceptance of it; then such portion will be remitted by Mr. RAINY to the vendor by whom he is employed.

With regard to sales of pictures or other works of art, jewels, plate, libraries, and other valuables, a considerable reduction will also be made in the commission, as compared with the printed terms of Messrs. Christie and Manson, Mr. George Robins, and most other auctioneers. On this branch, however, no payment is contemplated to any of that numerous class of individuals who perpetually attempt to interfere, as middle men, and ask to be rewarded for doing nothing: such voluntary interference being wholly useless and absurd, and, indeed, very often mischievous to the interests of those whom they pretend to serve. The allowance, therefore, which many auctioneers give, and those persons in secret receive, upon what is termed "the reciprocity system" (meaning, in plain language, on the part of the auctioneer, "procure the sale for me, and I will hand over to you a share of the profit"), will be the amount of the reduction in Mr RAINY'S new scale of commission on chattel and personal property, solely and exclusively in favour of the vendor; and where the total gross proceeds may exceed 5,000*l.* a still further abatement will apply to the residue.

A similar rule will also govern Mr. RAINY'S charges for putting up property to Auction, if not sold; for purchases, valuations (including those for probate), references in cases of compensation, or opinions upon cases; obtaining loans upon mortgage (in conjunction with solicitors), and all other matters incidental to property.

In conclusion, he begs to add that, as heretofore, no sale will be undertaken by him the genuine character of which will not bear investigation, and every exertion will be made to counteract and defeat combinations and deceptions, whether they are directed against vendors or purchasers.

YORKSHIRE LAW SOCIETY.—At a Meeting of the Yorkshire Law Society, held at the Law Library, Minster-gates, York, on Tuesday, the 30th of April, 1844, James Richardson, jun. esq. in the chair. A circular on the subject of the Ecclesiastical Courts Bill, addressed by London agents to solicitors in the country, dated the 27th April, having been read, as well as an inclosed petition of the Incorporated Law Society to the House of Commons, it was resolved:—

That this meeting regrets to observe the Profession in London continually endeavouring to turn all reforms of the law to their own immediate advantage, in a manner most unjust to the public resident in the provinces.

That this meeting recommends to the people of the country to resist, to the utmost of their power, any further centralization of legal business in the metropolis, whether in ecclesiastical or civil matters; that the administration of the law entirely in London may be convenient and satisfactory to the officials and practitioners there, but it is ruinously expensive and unjust to the people; that local courts for the proof and deposit of wills, as well as for the recovery of small debts, those being matters in which multitudes are interested, are obviously of the greatest practical utility, and to enable the people to obtain justice at all, it is desirable to administer it as near to their homes as practicable.

That at present the inhabitants of this city, and of the neighbourhood for many miles around, have the opportunity of searching for and perusing wills in the Registry at York at the small cost of one shilling each; but if a general depository of wills were established in London, as recommended by the petition of the Incorporated Law Society, it would cost the parties for the least information with regard to the contents of a will, at least twenty times as much; and the result would be similar with respect to other dioceses.

That the recommendation contained in the circular, that wills and intestacies should be referred to a branch of the Court of Chancery, and all testamentary contests and the administration of assets dealt with and disposed of in that court alone, is so monstrous, that this Meeting has a difficulty in believing the parties making the recommendation to be serious;—it being notorious, that if there be one court more odious to the people than another, it is the Court of Chancery; the official and agency fees therein are now so heavy, that the country solicitors are very generally ceasing, as far as possible, to practise in it; and to the clients (unless of ample fortune) it is ruinous, so that numbers of persons having no remedy in other courts, are practically debarred from obtaining justice.

That the petitions in favour of the Ecclesiastical Courts Bill, as introduced by the Government, and of the principle of the County Courts Bill, now read, be adopted, and presented to the House of Commons.

That these resolutions be advertised in the "Law Times."
JAMES RICHARDSON, Jun. Chairman.

Norwood, Surrey.—Neat Family Cottage, with Five Acres of Land.

MESSRS. DAVIS and VIGERS are instructed to SELL by AUCTION, at the Mart, on Tuesday, May 28, at Twelve o'clock, a comfortable RESIDENCE, with good Garden and enclosed Meadows, only five miles from London, having continual communication by coaches and omnibuses, at low fares. The accommodation affords seven airy chambers, three sitting-rooms, and convenient offices, chaise-house, stabling, and gardener's lodge. The grounds are very retired, with commanding views. A gentleman with London engagements may here, at very moderate cost, find a quiet home with economical enjoyment of the country. The house stands back from the high road, on the right, a little beyond the Horns, Norwood, and may be viewed by leave of the tenant, Mr. Thompson.

Maryland, North America.—Territorial Estate of 12,700 Acres, with great Mineral, Agricultural, and other resources, in the finest part of the United States.

MESSRS. DAVIS and VIGERS are instructed to SELL by AUCTION, at the Mart, on Tuesday, May 28, at Twelve o'clock, unless previously disposed of, a PROPERTY singular for its many valuable resources and vast capability of improvement, with fine openings for profitable investment of capital. Such extensive means for realizing a delightful princely independence at a comparative small cost, and without hazard, have probably never before been offered for sale in this country. The estate consists of 12,700 acres, situate fifteen miles west of Hancock, and twenty-two miles east of Cumberland, and only a fortnight's journey from England. The climate is remarkably fine, salubrious, and agreeable, and adapted to European constitutions. The soil is fertile, and produces the corn and fruits of Britain, with the addition of maize, tobacco, grapes, and the finer growth of the south. The mineral resources are rich, iron is abundant, and coal is found in several places, water-power to a great extent is at command. A considerable expenditure has already been incurred, of which the purchaser will have the advantage, but a vast field remains for profitable improvements, and there can be no doubt that the many resources may be brought to yield an incalculable return. The purchase would be eligible for a body of individuals, as it affords room for the settlement and operations of several families; and in order to ensure entire confidence, the sale is made subject to a condition which gives the purchaser three months to affirm or annul his bargain, and the option of leaving half the purchase money on mortgage.

For further information and particulars, apply to JAMES SPEED, Esq. Baltimore, Maryland; Messrs. FRESHFIELD, 5, Bank-buildings; and to Messrs. DAVIS and VIGERS, 3, Frederick's-place, Old Jewry, London.

Lindfield, Sussex.—Freehold Estate, with Villa, eighteen Cottages, seven Houses, and 114 acres of Land, let in small Farms, producing at low rents 275*l.* per annum.

MESSRS. DAVIS and VIGERS are instructed to SELL by AUCTION, at the Mart, on Tuesday, May 28, at Twelve o'clock, in two lots, that very interesting ESTATE, called the GRAVELLY COLONY, situate in a fast-improving part of Sussex, only fourteen miles from Brighton, and one from the Hayward's-heath Railway Station. It comprises a comfortable Residence, containing five chambers, three sitting rooms, and very convenient offices, an observatory, coach-house and stables, with farm offices, garden, orchard, cottage, and eighteen acres of land; now let at a ground-rent on lease, of which only a few years are unexpired; the remainder, except some small portions of woodland, is divided into allotments for cottage cultivation. There are six neat houses, four of which are adapted for summer family residences, with farm offices, having from five to fifteen acres of land attached, and eighteen superior cottages, with one acre and a quarter of ground attached to each; the whole being admirably arranged for the comfort and happiness of the occupiers. On this estate for many years lived the late philanthropic William Allen, who successfully carried out his benevolent plans for improving the condition of the peasantry by building them suitable houses, and giving to each sufficient land for their use and occupation; and the advantages of the system are here fully developed in the greater comfort, independence, and better morals of the occupiers; and surrounded by a thriving and grateful tenantry, his residence here must have been truly delightful. The situation is remarkably pleasant and healthy, and on account of its milder marine air, is highly recommended to invalids in preference to Brighton, and becoming much frequented.

Particulars may be had at the New Ship, Brighton; Star, Lewes; Red Lion, Lindfield; Greyhound, Croydon; and in London, at the Mart; of Messrs. J. C. and H. FRESHFIELD, 5, New Bank-buildings; and of the Auctioneers, 3, Frederick's-place, Old Jewry.

And also Freehold Building Ground, situate facing the sea, in the best part of Sandgate, on Monday, the 13th day of May, 1844, at the Rose Inn, Folkestone, at one for two o'clock precisely, unless previously disposed of by private contract, of which due notice will be given.

The house is calculated for a gentleman's residence, and is well adapted for a respectable school, boarding-house, or invalid establishment, having five domestic offices on the basement, four good rooms on the ground floor, and ten bed rooms, with stable and coach-house, and it may be had without any, or with all, or any part of the land.

The Building-ground at Sandgate consists of a field at the west end, adjoining land belonging to the devisees of Hugh Hammersley, esq. and the Reverend Thomas Pearce, containing a good sea frontage of 239 feet, with ample depth, to be divided into front and back building ground. It is almost the only unrestricted freehold frontage in this favourite watering-place, and will be sold in building-plots, unless an eligible offer is made for the whole.

To view the house and land (late the residence of James Jeffery, esq. deceased) apply to Mr. Marsh, at the cottage adjoining the residence.

TO THE LEGAL PROFESSION AND ALL WHO WISH TO SECURE THEIR WRITINGS AGAINST FRAUD.

STEPHENS'S RECORD WRITING FLUID.—This Writing Fluid has been examined at the Royal Institution of Great Britain, by one of the first Chemists of this country; there is no article which combines so effectually the power of resisting chemical agents, washing, damp, friction, and time. It has more of the character of Printing Ink, made fluid, than of common Writing Ink: its basis being carbon, it is indestructible, except by fire. It dries with a gloss, and follows every movement of the pen with the greatest facility. As it flows more freely than common Ink, it requires for fine writing, a finely pointed pen. For Records, it realizes what has long been hoped for—namely, a durability equal to printing. Broad-nibbed pens for full large writing, will not be required to the same extent for this article. It has no action whatever upon steel pens. Carbon not being a soluble matter, has a tendency slowly to subside; the necessity of occasionally shaking the Inkholder is, therefore, apparent. The Inkholders contrived by me are best adapted for the use of this article.

N.B. This Ink writes more agreeably after it has been a day or two in use.

Hard, well-sized paper should be chosen; as soft, flocky, absorbent papers cause it to write with too thick a stroke. It is admirably adapted to rapid writing.

Sold in Bottles, at 3d. 6d. 1s. and 3s. each, by Booksellers and Stationers, and by the Inventor, HENRY STEPHENS, 54, Stamford-street, Blackfriars-road, London.

Making, with the said meadow and pasture land, in Mrs. Kennedy's occupation, a total of 638a. 1r. 16p. of farming land, worth, at present, on the average, 47s. per acre per annum, susceptible of great immediate improvement for agricultural purposes, and containing numerous plots likely to become valuable as building land.

Also the Several Detached PLANTATIONS, skirting portions of the said farms, and containing, in the whole, 6a. 1r. 9p. of land.

Also TWENTY-FOUR COTTAGES, with the Gardens and Appurtenances thereto belonging, situate in Alkrington aforesaid, and now or late in the respective occupations of Robert Collinge, Kay Grime, Robert Hall, and others.

Also the several well-secured CHIEF or GROUND RENTS of 2l. 10s., 1l. 10s., 1l. and 19s. 6d. respectively issuing out of plots of land and buildings at Stocks, Little Heaton, and Wink's Brook, under building leases granted to Elizabeth Bostock, Richard Fletcher, Elizabeth Hunt, and Edmund Butterworth.

Also the Estate and Interest of the owner of the estate, in the RIVULETS or STREAMS of WATER, and the BEDS thereof, forming nearly the whole of the easterly, northerly, and westerly boundaries, and rendering many parts of the estate peculiarly eligible as sites for manufactories, or works requiring water or water power.

Also the ALKRINGTON COLLIERY, with the Mines, Engine-houses, Buildings, and Conveniences belonging thereto, and late in lease to Messrs. T. Livesey and Co.; and all and every other the Seams or Beds of Coal and Cannel under the estate, and under the adjoining property of Messrs. Jones and Gould; together with the Liberties and Privileges for working the same. The Mines already opened are those known as the Oldham Black Mine and the Bent Mine. They have an easy dip of inclination of one in five, or about seven inches in a yard, and an average thickness of three feet and three inches, and extend in length, from east to west, about 1,900 yards on a level line in the coal; one of them is 140, and the other 150 yards from the pit mouth.

The Estate, which comprises nearly the entire township of Alkrington, lies in a ring fence: it is about a mile and a half in length, a mile in breadth, and 4½ miles in circumference; and contains, exclusive of roads and the beds of streams, upwards of 700 statute acres of land. It is intersected for about a mile by the new Manchester and Middleton Turnpike-road; its southerly boundary is near the Manchester and Rochdale Canal, and the Mills Hill and Oldham stations on the Manchester and Leeds Railway. The Hall, which stands on a commanding eminence, overlooking the old Manchester and Middleton Turnpike-road, is approached by that road from Manchester through the delightful suburbs of Cheetham Hill and Crumpsall. The distance from Manchester is five miles, from Middleton half a mile, from Oldham three miles, and from Blackley a mile and a half. The tithes and Easter dues, except those of the 12a. 1r. 13p. of land in Blackley, are commuted for a corn rent-charge of 38l. 1s. 6d. which is specially apportioned on a part of the estate least likely to be required for building purposes. The population of Alkrington comprises one or two paupers only, and the poor-rates are proportionably low.

To the capitalist, the estate, from its magnitude, its compactness, its propinquity to the markets of Manchester, Middleton, Oldham, and Blackley; its facilities of access by roads, rail, and canal; its present capabilities, and its prospective increased and increasing value, affords an opportunity of investment rarely to be met with.—Immediate possession of the mansion lately occupied by Mrs. Tetlow may be had.

For further particulars, apply to Messrs. BEEVER and DARWELL, solicitors, Salford, or to Messrs. LOWE, SWEETING, and BYRNE, 22, Southampton-buildings, Chancery lane, London.

This Society has been established upwards of 34 years; all just demands upon its funds have been promptly and liberally settled; nearly two millions and a half have been thus paid away on expired policies; and to meet the existing engagements of the Institution, it possesses funds amounting to upwards of a million and three-quarters, almost wholly invested on real and Government securities.

The Rates of Premium are BELOW those of most other Offices, and, under the age of 45, not less so than ten per cent.—a benefit in itself equivalent to an annual bonus; whilst periodical additions are also made to the sums assured upon all policies for the whole duration of life, in proportion to the amount of premium paid; the full advantage of Life Assurance is thus enjoyed by the members of this Institution.

The subjoined List of some of the existing Policies of the Society exhibits the aggregate amount of Bonus assigned to each of those Policies, including that declared at the General Meeting held on the 9th of September, 1842.

THIS IS THE ONLY COMPANY who are bound by their deed of constitution not to dispute any Policy, unless they can prove that it was obtained by fraudulent misrepresentation; the great aim and object of the Society having been to render Life Policies COMPLETE SECURITIES and NEGOTIABLE DOCUMENTS, which shall owe their value to the certainty of the contracts upon which they are founded, and be independent of the liberality or caprice of those who shall be in the management of the affairs of the Company when the claims arise; and for this purpose the Company have, by a clause in their deed of constitution, unhesitatingly deprived themselves of the power of objecting to any policy, unless they undertake to prove that it was obtained from them by fraudulent misrepresentation. The regulations common to all other Life Companies, which make the validity of assurance contracts dependent upon the perfect correctness of the many statements required from a proposer for a Life Policy, and which have given rise to almost all the questions which have been argued in the courts, and to many extra-judicial compromises, are thus entirely abrogated; and nothing but fraud, proved to have been committed against them, can vitiate a policy granted by this Company.

THIS IS THE ONLY COMPANY from whom the assured, on the mutual principle, receive the whole of the mutual accumulations, and also a guarantee from the Shareholders for the sums assured.

THIS IS THE ONLY COMPANY who bind themselves to pay the sums in the Policies, although the debts for which they were effected shall have been liquidated before the claims arise; the Company considering it only just towards the assured, that where premiums have been received for assuring a given amount, that amount should be paid when it becomes due, without dispute or deduction; and they undertake to do so without reference to the state of the accounting between the assured and his debtor.

THIS IS ALMOST THE ONLY COMPANY who grant in favour of creditors whole world Policies, whereby the debt is secured, although the debtor should go beyond the limits of Europe.

The premiums, calculated according to the Carlisle tables, are lower than usual upon young lives, where participation in the profits is not required; and for short assurances, which, at the option of the assured, may be continued for life, the rates are as low as a due regard to complete security will permit.

TRIENNIAL ASCENDING SCALE TO ASSURE £100.

Age.	1st Three Years.			2nd Three Years.			3rd Three Years.			4th Three Years.			Remainder of Life.

60	4	8	11	5	17	4	7	5	9	8	14	2	10	2	7

BY THE HALF-PREMIUM PLAN, only one-half of the premium for the first seven years is required, the other half being payable at the convenience of the assured; thus allowing a Policy to be continued for seven years at one-half of the usual rate, or to be dropped at one-half of the usual sacrifice, and entitling the assured, seven years hence, when loss of health may prevent him from effecting a new assurance, to continue a Policy at a rate of premium applicable to an age seven years younger. The Half-premium plan of assurance, as practised by this Company, thus enables persons to retain to their own use the one-half of the premiums for the first seven years, at 5*l*. per cent. interest. Thus, suppose the ordinary premium for an assurance of 500*l*. to be 10*l*., the first payment by the half-premium plan will be five guineas, being the one-half of the 10*l*., and interest for the retained half; and, if death should occur in the first year, the sum of 500*l*. would be paid less the 5*l*. retained. The assured may thus have the use for the first year of 5*l*.; for the second of 10*l*.; and so on till the end of the seventh year, when the retained sums, amounting to 35*l*., may either be repaid, or retained at 5*l*. per cent. interest until death, when the 35*l*. would be subtracted from the 500*l*. then payable by the Company.

This Company, established by Act of Parliament, affords the most perfect security in a large paid-up Capital, and in the great success which has attended it since its commencement in 1834,

Its Annual Income being upwards of £60,000.

In 1841, the Company declared an addition to the Shareholders of one-half of their Stock, and also added a Bonus of 2*l*. per cent. per annum on the sum insured to all policies of the participating class from the time they were effected.

The Bonus added to policies from March, 1834, to the 31st Dec., 1840, is as follows:—

Sum Assured.	Time Assured.	Sum added to Policy.
£5,000	6 Yrs. 10 Months.	£683 6s. 8d.
5,000	6 Years	600 0 0
5,000	4 Years	400 0 0
5,000	2 Years	200 0 0

The Premiums nevertheless are on the most moderate scale, and only one-half need be paid for the first Five Years, where the Insurance is for Life.

Every information will be afforded on application to the Resident Directors, EDWARD BOYD, Esq., and E. LENNOX BOYD, Esq., of No. 8, Waterloo-place, Pall-mall, London.

ADVANTAGES OF THIS INSTITUTION.

The whole of the profits divided annually among the holders of policies on which five annual premiums shall have been paid.

Credit given for half the amount of the first five annual premiums, by which means assurances may be effected and loans for short periods secured with the least possible present outlay, and after payment of the arrears, the policy-holder will become entitled to participate in the entire profit of this Institution, precisely in the same manner as if he had paid the whole amount of his premiums in advance in the usual way.

Thus, for example:—A person in the 25th year of his age, instead of paying 2*l*. 6s. per annum for an assurance of 100*l*. would be required to pay 1*l*. 3s. only during the first five years, when, on payment of the arrears of premium, amounting to 5*l*. 15s., his share of the profits would be such as to reduce his future annual premiums to very little more than the half-premium of 1*l*. 3s. originally paid by him. The Great Britain is the only Mutual Assurance Society in which this very great accommodation is given to the assured.

Credit allowed for the whole of the first five annual premiums, on satisfactory security being given for the payment of the same at the expiration of five years.

Transfers of policies effected and registered (without charge) at the office.

Claims on policies not subject to be litigated or disputed, except with the sanction, in each case, of a general meeting of the assured, to be specially convened on the occasion.

Holders of policies of 1,000*l*. entitled (after payment of five annual premiums) to attend and vote at all general meetings of the assured, who will have the superintendence and control of the funds and affairs of the Society.

Full particulars are detailed in the prospectus, which, with every requisite information, may be obtained by application to A. R. IRVINE, Managing Director.

A liberal commission allowed to Solicitors and Agents.

CHOICE of a SERVANT.—DOMESTIC

BAZAAR, 326, Oxford-street, corner of Regent's-circus, established 1830.—Families in want of good Servants will decidedly find their interest consulted by applying at the Bazaar, as domestics are waiting to be hired from ten to five, and, to insure giving satisfaction, none but those of the best description are suffered to attend. The subscriber may select any servant likely to suit, who refers to the family with whom she last lived; and should inquiries not prove satisfactory, they may select others. This thoroughly straightforward method has been found to give universal satisfaction, and the farce of applying to tradespeople, and waiting an indefinite period, is therefore obviated, as at this establishment a respectable servant can be procured immediately. Fee for one servant, 2s. 6d.; for as many as may be required, 14s. per annum.

Sales by Auction.

Under a Fiat of Bankruptcy.—Valuable Leasehold Estates for Investment and Occupation, Kingsland-road and Hoxton.

DAVIS and VIGERS are directed by the Assignees of Mr. Thomas Amos, to SELL by AUCTION, at the Auction Mart, on Tuesday, May 14, at Twelve for One, in Two Lots, SIX substantial brick-built RESIDENCES, 114 and 115, Tyssen-place, and 22, 23, 24, and 25, Flemming-street, Kingsland-road, Middlesex, and a very extensive range of workshops in Flemming-street, lately occupied by the bankrupt in his trade, a builder. Also, a Piece of Ground, with valuable frontage of 30 feet, and range of workshops and other buildings thereon, situate in East-street, Hoxton, shewing together a rental of 226*l.* per annum.

The Premises may be viewed by permission of the several tenants. Particulars, &c. to be had of J. F. GROOM, Esq. Official Assignee, Abchurch-lane; Messrs. J. and W. SHEFFIELD, Solicitors, 147, Leadenhall-street, G. W. ARMSTRONG, Esq. 33, Old Jewry; at the Auction Mart; and Messrs. DAVIS and VIGER'S Offices, 3, Frederick's-place, Old Jewry.

Norwood, Surrey.—Neat Family Cottage, with Five Acres of Land.

MESSRS. DAVIS and VIGERS are instructed to SELL by AUCTION, at the Auction Mart, on Tuesday, May 28, at Twelve, a comfortable RESIDENCE, with good garden and inclosed meadows, only five miles from London, having continual communication by coaches and omnibuses, at low fares. The accommodation affords seven airy chambers, three sitting-rooms, and convenient offices, chaise-house, stabling, and gardener's lodge. The grounds are very retired, with commanding views. A gentleman with London engagements may here, at very moderate cost, find a quiet home with economical enjoyment of the country. The house stands back from the high road on the right, a little beyond the Horns, Norwood, and may be viewed by leave of the tenant, Mr. Thompson.

Maryland, North America.—Territorial Estate of 12,700 acres, with great mineral, agricultural, and other resources, in the finest part of the United States.

MESSRS. DAVIS and VIGERS are instructed to SELL by AUCTION, at the Auction Mart, on Tuesday, May 28, at Twelve, unless previously disposed of, a PROPERTY singular for its many valuable resources and vast capability of improvement, with fine openings for profitable investment of capital. Such extensive means for realizing a delightful princely independence, at a comparatively small cost and without hazard, have probably never before been offered for sale in this country. The estate consists of 12,700 acres, situate only a fortnight's journey from England. The climate is remarkably fine, salubrious, and agreeable, and adapted to European constitutions. The soil is fertile, and produces the corn and fruits of Britain, with the addition of maize, tobacco, grapes, and the finer growth of the South. The mineral resources are rich, iron is abundant, and coal is found in several places, and water power to a great extent is at command. A considerable expenditure has already been incurred, of which the purchaser will have the advantage, but a vast field remains for profitable improvements, and there can be no doubt that the many resources may be brought to yield an incalculable return. The purchase would be eligible for a company or body of individuals, as it affords room for the settlement and operations of several families; and in order to ensure entire confidence, the sale is made subject to a condition which gives the purchaser three months to affirm or annul his bargain, and the option of leaving half the purchase-money on mortgage.

For further information and particulars apply to JAMES SPEED, esq. Baltimore, Maryland; Messrs. FRESHFIELD, 5, Bank-buildings; and to Messrs. DAVIS and VIGERS, 3, Frederick's-place, Old Jewry, London.

Lindfield, Sussex.—Freehold Estate, with Villa, eighteen Cottages, seven Houses, and 114 acres of Land, let in small Farms, producing at low rents 275*l.* per annum.

MESSRS. DAVIS and VIGERS are instructed to SELL by AUCTION, at the Mart, on Tuesday, May 28, in Two Lots, that very interesting ESTATE, called the GRAVELY COLONY, situate in a fast improving part of Sussex, only fourteen miles from Brighton, and one from the Hayward's Heath Railway Station. It comprises a comfortable residence, observatory, coach-house, and stables, with farm offices, garden, orchard, cottage, and eighteen acres of land; now let at a ground-rent on lease, of which only a few years are unexpired; the remainder, except some small portions of wood-land, is divided into allotments for cottage cultivation. There are six neat houses, four of which are adapted for family summer residences, with farm offices, having five to fifteen acres of land attached, and eighteen superior cottages, with one acre and a quarter of ground to each, the whole being admirably arranged for the comfort and happiness of the occupier. On this estate for many years lived the late philanthropic William Allen, who here successfully carried out his benevolent plans for improving the condition of the peasantry, by building them suitable houses, and giving to each sufficient land for their use and occupation, and the advantages of the system are fully developed in the greater comfort, independence, and better morals of the occupiers; and, surrounded by a thriving and grateful tenantry, his residence here must have been truly delightful. The situation is remarkably pleasant and healthy, and, on account of its milder marine air, is highly recommended to invalids in preference to Brighton, and is becoming much frequented.

Particulars may be had at the New Ship, Brighton; Star, Lewes; Red Lion, Lindfield; Greyhound, Croydon; and in London, at the Auction Mart; of Messrs. J. C. and H. FRESHFIELD, 5, New Bank-buildings; and of the Auctioneers, 3, Frederick's-place, Old Jewry.

GREAT REDUCTION IN THE PRICES OF THE PERRYIAN PENS.—QUALITY IMPROVED.

JAMES PERRY & CO. have the pleasure to announce that in consequence of increased facility in the manufacture of their Pens, they have reduced the prices to the level of all other Pens in the market, at the same time their superiority in quality is maintained.

J. P. & Co. embrace this opportunity to return thanks to their numerous friends for the decided preference given the Perryian Pens for so many years, and caution the public against the spurious imitations which are frequently imposed upon them for the genuine Perryian Pens.

PERRYIAN INK, 6d. 1s. and 2s. per Bottle. This Ink is most suitable for all kinds of Metallic Pens, and exceedingly good for pens made from quills. It is also suitable for the copying machine. The ordinary inks do not flow freely down Metallic Pens, and from their corrosive nature are very injurious to them; the Perryian Ink possesses every requisite good quality, has a flowing property peculiar to itself, and does not corrode pens as other inks. Writing performed with this ink in a short time becomes of a deep raven black, and never turns brown in any climate.

Also in Powders, at 6d and 1s. each, the latter sufficient to make a wine bottle full of ink.

Sold by all Stationers and Dealers in Metallic Pens, and at the Manufactory, 37, Red Lion-square, London.

CHOICE of a SERVANT.—DOMESTIC BAZAAR, 326, Oxford-street, corner of Regent's-circus, established 1830.—Families in want of good Servants will decidedly find their interest consulted by applying at the Bazaar, as domestics are waiting to be hired from ten to five, and to insure giving satisfaction, none but those of the best description are suffered to attend. The subscriber may select any servant likely to suit, who refers to the family with whom she last lived; and should inquiries not prove satisfactory, they may select others. This thoroughly straightforward method has been found to give universal satisfaction, and the tax of applying to tradespeople, and waiting an indefinite period, is therefore obviated, as at this establishment a respectable servant can be procured immediately. Fee for one servant, 2s. 6d.; for as many as may be required, 14s. per annum.

THE LONDON IMPROVED MANIFOLD LETTER WRITER, for producing a Letter and several copies at one time, complete for 7s. 6d. Travelling Cases, 7s. 6d. each. Superfine Draft Paper, 8s. 6d. per Ream. Lithography executed at moderate charges. Gentlemen visiting London will find great advantage by purchasing at the London Paper and Parchment Warehouse, CLOSSON and CO. 17, Holborn (opposite Furnival's Inn). Country orders executed.

THIS IS THE ONLY COMPANY who are bound by their deed of constitution not to dispute any Policy, unless they can prove that it was obtained by fraudulent misrepresentation; the great aim and object of the Society having been to render Life Policies COMPLETE SECURITIES and NEGOTIABLE DOCUMENTS, which shall owe their value to the certainty of the contracts upon which they are founded, and be independent of the liberality or caprice of those who shall be in the management of the affairs of the Company when the claims arise; and for this purpose the Company have, by a clause in their deed of constitution, unhesitatingly deprived themselves of the power of objecting to any policy, unless they undertake to prove that it was obtained from them by fraudulent misrepresentation. The regulations common to all other Life Companies, which make the validity of assurance contracts dependent upon the perfect correctness of the many statements required from a proposer for a Life Policy, and which have given rise to almost all the questions which have been argued in the courts, and to many extra-judicial compromises, are thus entirely abrogated; and nothing but fraud, proved to have been committed against them, can vitiate a policy granted by this Company.

THIS IS THE ONLY COMPANY from whom the assured, on the mutual principle, receive the whole of the mutual accumulations, and also a guarantee from the Shareholders for the sums assured.

THIS IS THE ONLY COMPANY who bind themselves to pay the sums in the Policies, although the debts for which they were effected shall have been liquidated before the claims arise; the Company considering it only just towards the assured, that where premiums have been received for assuring a given amount, that amount should be paid when it becomes due, without dispute or deduction; and they undertake to do so without reference to the state of the accounting between the assured and his debtor.

THIS IS ALMOST THE ONLY COMPANY who grant in favour of creditors whole world Policies, whereby the debt is secured, although the debtor should go beyond the limits of Europe.

The premiums, calculated according to the Carlisle tables, are lower than usual upon young lives, where participation in the profits is not required; and for short assurances, which, at the option of the assured, may be continued for life, the rates are as low as a due regard to complete security will permit.

BY THE HALF-PREMIUM PLAN only one-half of the premium for the first seven years is required, the other half being payable at the convenience of the assured, thus allowing a Policy to be continued for seven years at one-half of the usual rate, or to be dropped at one-half of the usual sacrifice, and entit. ; the assured, seven years hence, when loss of health may prevent him from effecting a new assurance, to continue a Policy at a rate of premium applicable to an age seven years younger. The Half-premium plan of assurance, as practised by this Company, thus enables persons to retain to their own use the one-half of the premiums for the first seven years, at 5*l.* per cent. interest. Thus, suppose the ordinary premium for an assurance of 500*l.* to be 10*l.*, the first payment by the half-premium plan will be five guineas, being the one-half of the 10*l.*, and interest for the retained half; and, if death should occur in the first year, the sum of 500*l.* would be paid less the 5*l.* retained. The assured may thus have the use for the first year of 5*l.*; for the second of 10*l.*; and so on till the end of the seventh year, when the retained sums, amounting to 35*l.*, may either be repaid, or retained at 5*l.* per cent. interest until death, when the 35*l.* would be subtracted from the 500*l.* then payable by the Company.

PUBLIC NOTICE.—Her Majesty's Commissioners of Woods, Forests, and Land Revenues, having taken Mr. GRIMSTONE'S extensive premises in Broad Street, Mr. G. has, at a very considerable expense, prepared very commodious premises, 434, Oxford Street, at which place he earnestly solicits a continuance of the kind support with which he has been favoured by the nobility and public generally. Mr. Grimstone's commercial intercourse enables him to vend his foreign goods in the most genuine condition; and he pledges himself to continue the manufacture of every article in its pure and pristine state. Testimonials of undoubted authority from the highest characters, proving the efficacy of his EYE SNUFF, may be seen at the warehouse, as above, and in the third edition of his Almanack, 1843 and 1844.—GRIMSTONE'S EYE SNUFF, sold in canisters, 8d. 1s. 3d. 2s. 4d. 4s. 4d. 8s., and 15s. 6d. each.

To Wm. Grimstone, Esq. 434, Oxford Street.

26th Aug. 1843.

Sir,—I was a sufferer for seven years, both eyes having been so swollen as to cause blindness. Among the many medical gentlemen who attended me was the famous oculist, Dr. Alexander; indeed, I do believe my case was beyond all their skill. "Physic, bleeding, blistering, with a seton, and all kinds of lotions, but no relief," till chancing one day being led by your house, 39, Broad Street, Bloomsbury, my guide inquired if I had tried your Eye Snuff, on which I purchased a 1s. 3d. canister, opened it in the shop, took some, and was greatly relieved before I reached my home. I can with truth assert, and make oath if required to do so, that it was your Eye Snuff cured me. Shall be happy to answer any inquiry. I continue to use it as frequently as other snuff.—(Third testimony to the above-named.)

I am, Sir, yours gratefully,
L. S. Brewer,
Dress Maker, 18, Silver Street,
late of 6, Edge Terrace, Kensington Gravel-pits.

36, Upper Stamford Street, Oct. 3, 1842.

Sir,—During my sedentary occupation as a literary man, I was subject to excruciating pains in the head, which frequently caused blindness for a time. I have taken your Eye Snuff for the last two years; and from my first using it, have been free from pain, and see without the use of glasses at this time.

CITY OF LONDON FASHIONABLE TAILORING ESTABLISHMENT, 52, King William-street, London Bridge.—Messrs. BURCH and LUCAS, Tailors, &c. late J. Albert, respectfully invite Gentlemen and Families to view one of the largest and best-assorted stocks in London, of superfine Cloth, Cassimers, and Waistcoatings of the most novel designs, Cach Merettes for Summer Coats, &c. &c. for the present season. The style of cut and make of every garment are guaranteed equal to the first and most expensive houses at the West End, and for cash payments a saving of 40 per cent. will be effected, and will be found to the wearer much cheaper than the inferior garments made up by puffing Slopsellers and Hosiers, at prices to astonish and delude the public, which description of goods are entirely excluded from this Establishment. 52, King William-street, City.—Established 1819.

CHOICE of a SERVANT.—DOMESTIC BAZAAR, 396, Oxford-street, corner of Regent's-circus, established 1830.—Families in want of good Servants will decidedly find their interest consulted by applying at the Bazaar, as domestics are waiting to be hired from ten to five, and to insure giving satisfaction, none but those of the best description are suffered to attend. The subscriber may select any servant likely to suit, who refers to the family with whom she last lived; and should inquiries not prove satisfactory, they may select others. This thoroughly straightforward method has been found to give universal satisfaction, and the farce of applying to tradespeople, and waiting an indefinite period, is therefore obviated, as at this establishment a respectable servant can be procured immediately. Fee for one servant, 2s. 6d.; for as many as may be required, 14s. per annum.

REDUCED SUBSCRIPTION to CHURTON'S LIBRARY, 26, HOLLES-STREET.—The standard collection of this extensive Library embraces upwards of 25,000 volumes, which is now thrown open to those requiring the perusal of the standard works only, at the reduced Subscription of Three Guineas per annum.

Though so many associations exist for promoting useful objects in Great Britain, yet the amendment of the law, when not undertaken by the Government, has been left either to the voluntary exertion of Individuals, or to that of a comparatively small number of persons, interested by trade, profession, or position, in some particular and detached alteration. Hence have arisen many insulated measures, perhaps good in themselves as relating to their immediate object, but too frequently inconsistent with the general frame of our jurisprudence; and hence, also, the utter omission of various necessary reforms, either because they are too minute for political, or too extensive for private consideration.

The object of this society is to associate together persons of various classes, interests, and professions, who will combine in collecting information as to existing defects, and in accumulating facts and suggestions as guides to future amelioration.

Though the greater number of its original members have been of the profession of the law, their object would be defeated if they were not joined by a large body of the unprofessional classes; since minds unfettered by habit and technicalities, when directed to a new subject, are most likely to discover defects, and not unfrequently suggest the best modes of amendment.

The society unequivocally disavows all objects of party politics; the end they propose to themselves is to be attained by giving and receiving information from all sources, foreign as well as domestic; and by rendering their stores of knowledge, so accumulated, more readily available to the public use.

LEA and PERRINS' WORCESTERSHIRE SAUCE.

Prepared from a Recipe of a Nobleman in the County.

"One of the most piquant inventions of this luxurious and epicurean age is Lea and Perrins' Worcestershire Sauce, adapted to Fish, Flesh, Fowl, and Soup; giving a zest far superior to the long-established favourites, more wholesome and of less cost."—Naval and Military Gazette, April 8, 1843.

"The truth of the familiar adage, 'appetite makes the best sauce,' which ought never to have dropped from the lips of a Frenchman, is boldly disputed by Messrs. Lea and Perrins, and not without justice; for since their invention the adage is inverted, the sauce positively creating the appetite."—The Court Journal, April 15, 1843.

Sold, Wholesale by the Proprietors, Messrs. LEA and PERRINS, Worcester; Messrs. BARCLAY and SONS, Farringdon-street, and the principal Oil and Italian Warehousemen, London; and Retail, by the usual venders of Sauces.

CITY OF LONDON FASHIONABLE TAILORING ESTABLISHMENT, 52, King William-street, London Bridge.—Messrs. BURCH and LUCAS, Tailors, &c. late J. Albert, respectfully invite Gentlemen and Families to view one of the largest and best-assorted stocks in London, of superfine Cloth, Cassimere, and Waistcoatings of the most novel designs, Cash Marettes for Summer Coats, &c. &c. for the present season. The style of cut and make of every garment are guaranteed equal to the first and most expensive houses at the West End, and for cash payments a saving of 40 per cent. will be effected, and will be found to the wearer much cheaper than the inferior garments made up by puffing Slopsellers and Hosiers, at prices to astonish and delude the public, which description of goods are entirely excluded from this Establishment. 52, King William-street, City. Established 1815.

CHOICE of a SERVANT.—DOMESTIC BAZAAR, 326, Oxford-street, corner of Regent's-circus, established 1840.—Families in want of good Servants will decidedly find their interest consulted by applying at the Bazaar, as domestics are waiting to be hired from ten to five, and to insure giving satisfaction, none but those of the best description are suffered to attend. The subscriber may select any servant likely to suit, who refers to the family with whom she last lived; and should inquiries not prove satisfactory, they may select others. This thoroughly straightforward method has been found to give universal satisfaction, and the farce of applying to tradespeople, and waiting an indefinite period, is therefore obviated, as at this establishment [illegible] immediately. Fee for one servant, 2s. 6d.; for as many as may be required, 14s. per annum.

REDUCED SUBSCRIPTION to CHURTON'S LIBRARY, 26, HOLLES-STREET.—The standard collection of this extensive Library embraces upwards of 25,000 volumes, which is now thrown open to those requiring the perusal of the standard works only, at the reduced Subscription of Three Guineas per annum.

DEATH.

KING, John, esq. many years a deputy-lieutenant, and formerly high-sheriff of the county, on the [illegible] inst. at [illegible]wood-house, Sussex, aged 74.

Raising the Wind.—A most ingenious act of imposition, attended with a forgery upon a highly respectable solicitors' firm in the City, was enacted a few days since in the legal neighbourhood of Lincoln's-inn. It appears some rogue, "learned in the law," prepared a fictitious case, in the usual terms of legal technicality, and which was duly endorsed "Case for the opinion of Mr. Bethell—two guineas." The names of certain clients of Mr. Bethell's, as usual, were endorsed at the bottom of the "case," and a check for 10*l*., purporting to be drawn by them upon Messrs. Lubbock, the bankers, was presented to the clerk, who, unsuspecting the fraud, at once handed over the difference between the fee and the 10*l*. Upon the check being presented for payment, the forgery was at once discovered. The delinquent, of course, pocketed the change, with inward glee at the adroitness of the imposition.

Marriage Act.—Some doubts having arisen upon the construction of the Act for marriages in England, and the late Act to amend the same, relative to that part which renders it competent to parties to be married at church under the certificate of the Superintendent Registrar, without the publication of banns as heretofore, whether such marriage could take place where neither of the parties reside in the parish, at the church of which they intended the marriage to take place, the opinion of the Registrar-General has been taken, and is contained in the following letter, sent from the Registrar's office to the Superintendent Registrar of the Colchester district:—

"I am directed by the Registrar-General to state that a minister of the Established Church would be justified in refusing to solemnize the marriage of parties, pursuant to the Superintendent Registrar's certificate, in the church of a parish in which neither of them is resident, although their residence may be in the Superintendent Registrar's district, within which such church is situate. The provisions of the 36th section of the Amendment Act give force to the Superintendent's certificate only in cases where (instead of such certificate) the publication of banns, which must be preceded by residence of parties, would effect the same object."

By Messrs. NEWTON and APPLETON, at the Mart.

Valuable reversionary property, consisting of money in the Funds, and the net proceeds, to arise from the sale of 21 capital freehold houses, desirably situated in Camberwell-grove and Grove-lane, Camberwell, including two houses in the New-road, St. George's-in-the-East, standing in the names of highly respectable trustees, now producing about 360*l*. per annum, nearly a moiety of which arises from ground-rents—1,280*l*.

The Value of American Property.—On Tuesday, at the Auction Mart, a territorial property, known as the "Town-hall" estate, situate in Maryland, United States, North America, and consisting of 12,470 acres of land, was offered for sale by auction. It was described as being only seventeen days' journey from England, being bounded by the Chesapeke and Ohio Canal, the Baltimore and Ohio Railway, and the river Potomac on the south, and on the north by the great turnpike-road from Baltimore and Washington to the Western States. Among its recommendations there were stated to be on the property, tobacco, houses, iron and coal mines, sulphur springs, highly charged with white sulphur, &c., and the soil could grow wheat, barley, tobacco; the white, black, and rock oak, some nearly 100 feet high, white, yellow, and red pines, some 120 feet high; dyeing and medicinal plants, sugar, &c. There was a communication with all the principal towns, and two mails, with four other coaches, passed through the estate. The auctioneer, on putting up the lot, observed that the sale was an experiment, to try if in England an American estate could find a sale. The auctioneer put the question three times without success, when the estate was repudiated.

Freehold Property.—The second portion of the large freehold estate, the property of the late Robert M'William, Esq., was submitted to public competition on Tuesday and Wednesday last, in 105 lots, at the Auction Mart, City. This, and the first portion, which was sold last season by the same auctioneer, is, with the exception of Lord Southampton's estate, sold lately by Mr. Robins, the largest and most genuine sale of freehold property that has taken place at one time for many years past, and affords a most interesting test, not only of the value of freehold property near London, but also of the value of money in the market at the present time. The large room was crowded both days, and the competition most spirited. The ground rents sold to pay about 3 per cent., the freehold houses to pay 5 to 5½ per cent., and the freehold building-ground at the average price of 2,000*l*. per acre. The result of the two days' sale amounted to 72,000*l*., making a total, with the first portion sold last year, of upwards of 98,000*l*., the property of this gentleman. A third portion remains yet to be sold.

Yorkshire.—The number of acres rated to the county rate in the three ridings of Yorkshire is 3,735,040, and the sum total of their valuation 3,383,435*l*. or little more than a pound an acre. Lancashire contains 1,130,240 acres, which are rated at 6,192,067*l*. This is the highest rating, except that of Middlesex, which contains only 180,480 acres, valued at 6,047,886*l*. The agricultural districts generally are rated at more than the Yorkshire proportion.

CHOICE of a SERVANT.—DOMESTIC BAZAAR, 326, Oxford-street, corner of Regent's-circus, established 1830.—Families in want of good Servants will decidedly find their interest consulted by applying at the Bazaar, as domestics are waiting to be hired from ten to five, and to insure giving satisfaction, none but those of the best description are suffered to attend. The subscriber may select any servant likely to suit, who refers to the family with whom she last lived; and should inquiries not prove satisfactory, they may select others. This thoroughly straightforward method has been found to give universal satisfaction, and the farce of applying to tradespeople, and waiting an indefinite period, is therefore obviated, as at this establishment a respectable servant can be procured immediately. Fee for one servant, 2s. 6d.; for as many as may be required, 14s. per annum.

Sir,—I was a sufferer for seven years, both eyes having been so swollen as to cause blindness. Among the many medical gentlemen who attended me was the famous oculist, Dr. ALEXANDER; indeed, I do believe my case was beyond all their skill. "Physic, bleeding, blistering, with a seton, and all kinds of lotions, but no relief," till chancing one day being led by your house, 39, Broad Street, Bloomsbury, my guide inquired if I had tried your Eye Snuff, on which I purchased a 1s. 3d. canister, opened it in the shop, took some, and was greatly relieved before I reached my home. I can with truth assert, and make oath if required to do so, that it was your Eye Snuff cured me. Shall be happy to answer any inquiry. I continue to use it as frequently as other snuff.—(Third testimony to the above-named.)

I am, Sir, yours gratefully,
L. S. BREWER,
Dress Maker, 18, Silver Street,
late of 3, Edge Terrace, Kensington Gravel-pits.

36, Upper Stamford Street, Oct. 3, 1842.

Sir,—During my sedentary occupation as a literary man, I was subject to excruciating pains in the head, which frequently caused blindness for a time. I have taken your Eye Snuff for the last two years; and from my first using it, have been free from pain, and see without the use of glasses at this time.

Any of the above sizes can be sent through the post, on receiving a cash order, postage included.

The Blackhow Laith Estate is in the occupation of Mr. Thomas Towler, as yearly tenant, and contains, including plantations, 47a. 2r. 14p. statute measure, or thereabouts. The farm-house and outbuildings are in good repair. Both the estates are pleasantly wooded, well drained, and in a high state of cultivation, a great part of the land being naturally of excellent quality; they lie on the slope of a hill, looking towards the south-west, and commanding beautiful views of the Pendle hills, and the deep and richly-wooded valley of Pendle Water.

A valuable brook, the Blackhow Foot Water, runs through part of both estates, and a most abundant and never-failing spring of excellent water rises close to the buildings on the Spouthouse estate.

The turnpike-road from Burnley to Gisburn runs through the estates close to the farm-houses; the ancient and pretty village of Barrowford lies within about a mile. Colne is distant about three miles, and Burnley seven miles.

The estates are copyhold of inheritance, held of the Manor of Ightenhill, and are subject to a rent or rents of 14s. 4d.

A considerable part of the purchase-money may remain on mortgage, if desired.

Mr. John Horsfield, on the premises, will shew the property, and for further particulars apply to Mr. William Ecroyd, Lomeshaye, Little Marsden; to William Nield, esq. Mayfield, Manchester; to the Auctioneer; and to BARLOW and ASTON, Solicitors, 1, Town Hall-buildings, Cross-street, Manchester.

The Estate lies in the centre of Mr. Farquharson's and Mr. Drax's Hunts, is well watered and timbered, and the whole of the premises are in good repair.

THE FIRST PUBLICATION OF

THE VERULAM SOCIETY will appear on Thursday next, the 20th instant. It will consist of No. 1. of PRACTICAL REPORTS, comprising the MAGISTRATES' CASES of Easter Term last, by A. BITTLESTONE and J. C. SYMONS, Esqrs. Barristers-at-Law.

N.B. The PRACTICAL REPORTS will consist of—I. MAGISTRATES' CASES, by A. BITTLESTONE and J. C. SYMONS, Barristers-at-Law. II. PRACTICE CASES, by J. A. FOOTE, T. W. SAUNDERS, H. B. ASPINALL, and H. T. ATKINSON, Esqrs. Barristers-at-Law. III. REAL PROPERTY CASES, by R. G. WELFORD, G. GOLDSMITH, H. BAKER, T. MACAULEY, and G. T. ALLNUTT, Esqrs. Barristers-at-Law. IV. CROWN CASES in the Central Criminal Court and on Circuit; and NISI PRIUS PRACTICE CASES, by various Barristers. Each Case to be authenticated by the Reporter.

The purpose of these PRACTICAL REPORTS is to supply to the Profession, at a trifling cost, and in the convenient compass of a single volume, full Reports of all the Cases likely to be useful in ordinary practice, without the necessity that now exists of purchasing and carrying about with them a mass of cases that are seldom or never referred to, save in the Courts above, where ready access to them can be obtained.

The PRACTICAL REPORTS of the Verulam Society will, it is expected, supply to the members, at a cost of about twelve shillings per annum, the above information, which they can now only procure by an outlay of upwards of twenty pounds per annum.

They will be issued in Parts, as completed. Each Part will consist of 32 pages large octavo, and will contain nearly as much matter as one of the Parts of the ordinary Reports. The outside leaves will be cut off in binding, so that the sheets will be clean and continuous. It will be stamped, and sent free by post to the Subscribers in the country, as being cheaper and less troublesome than conveyance by parcel. They will form one annual volume.

The price will be, for each Part, to members of the Society, thirteen pence; to other persons, nineteen pence.

A PORTFOLIO for preserving the numbers of the current volume of the VERULAM SOCIETY REPORTS, so that they may be readily referred to, may be had at the Office, or by order from any Bookseller in the Country, Price 5s.

Members of the Society who may not have ordered the Reports are requested to do so forthwith. We subjoin a

PROSPECTUS OF THE VERULAM SOCIETY.

This Society is established to supply the members with Law Reports and Text Books at accessible prices.

It will consist of an indefinite number of Members.

Any person will be admitted a Member on payment of an entrance fee of 10s. 6d. before the 1st of August: after that date, the entrance fee will be 1*l.* 1s. (to defray the outlay of forming the Society and its current expenses), and an annual subscription of 2*l.* 2s. at the least. But payment of the subscription will not be required until the Society proceeds to publish some of the more costly of the works contemplated.

The Members will be entitled to all, or any of, the publications of the Society at the Society's prices. But if more in value be ordered than the amount of subscription will cover, the further sum must be transmitted with the order.

It should be expressly understood that the Members will incur no risks or responsibilities whatever. Arrangements have been made to avoid the difficulties of the Law of Partnership; thus: The works of the Society will be issued by the Publisher of the LAW TIMES at the Office of that Journal, on his single responsibility, as his own publication; but he will be secured from loss by the plan, which will invariably be followed, of sending to all the Members a notice of each publication as it is projected, with a form of order, and none will be published which does not thus previously secure subscribers enough to repay its expenses. By these means the Members will secure all the advantages of a sufficient supply of good and useful Law Books, at the lowest prices at which they can be produced, without incurring any of the risks and liabilities of partnership. This two-fold object is effectually accomplished by making it, in fact, a machinery for the publication of useful works by subscription.

The Society commences with the issue of the above series of Practical Reports, because its numbers do not yet justify entering on larger undertakings, and in the hope that, once in action, it will receive a large influx of supporters. As soon as the requisite number of Members is obtained, other more important works will be entered upon. One thousand Subscribers will justify the publication of a complete series of Reports of all the Courts, and 1,250 will permit the undertaking of a series of practical text-books at one-fourth of their present cost.

It should be understood that the whole of the subscription will be repaid in books, or the balance returned.

Persons desirous of joining the Society are requested to send their names and addresses, with the entrance fee, to the Publisher of the LAW TIMES, at the Offices of the Verulam Society, 29, Essex-street, Strand.

 A list of subscribers was published in No. 62 of the LAW TIMES, and further lists will appear as names are received.

CHOICE of a SERVANT.—DOMESTIC BAZAAR, 336, Oxford-street, corner of Regent's-circus, established 1830.—Families in want of good Servants will decidedly find their interest consulted by applying at the Bazaar, as domestics are waiting to be hired from ten to five, and to insure giving satisfaction, none but those of the best description are suffered to attend. The subscriber may select any servant likely to suit, who refers to the family with whom she last lived; and should inquiries not prove satisfactory, they may select others. This thoroughly straightforward method has been found to give universal satisfaction, and the fares of applying to tradespeople, and waiting an indefinite period, is therefore obviated, as at this establishment a respectable servant can be procured immediately. Fee for one servant, 2s. 6d.; for as many as may be required, 14s. per annum.

In Cambridgeshire, on the borders of Huntingdonshire.—Valuable Advowson, with Next Presentation, and, on the completion of the Peterborough Railway, will be within three hours' ride of the metropolis.

MESSRS. FULLER and MARSH beg to inform their friends and the public that they have been honoured with instructions from the Proprietor to SELL by AUCTION, at the Mart, on Wednesday, June 26, at 12, (unless previously disposed of by private contract,) the PERPETUAL ADVOWSON and NEXT PRESENTATION to the VICARAGE of CHATTERIS, in the Isle of Ely, Cambridgeshire, producing a net annual income of 1,721*l.* 9s. 11d., and with the Mansion and Glebe Lands in hand may be considered of the annual value of about 1,850*l.* A portion of the income consists of 1,0[illegible]l. 6s. 11d., receivable from a corn rent charge, (exempt from all parochial assessments by the Chatteris Enclosure Act,) in lieu of vicarial tithes, arising from 7,104 acres of exceedingly rich arable, pasture, and wood land, and the remainder arises from 341 acres of glebe land of first-rate quality in a high state of cultivation. The Vicarage-house (a mansion adapted for a family of the first respectability) is of a modern elevation and pleasantly situate at a short remove from the High-street, and is surrounded by plantations and pleasure grounds, studded with timber of stately growth. This valuable and important advowson is a peculiarly eligible property, inasmuch as the corn rent charge is secured by Act of Parliament, is not subject to any deductions for parochial charges, and is only variable once in seven years (instead of every year, as by the Tithe Commutation Act), and then only in case the rector, vicar, or parishioners shall give notice as prescribed by the Act. Indeed, the income may be considered less fluctuating than from ordinary landed property, as it may be termed a nearly permanent rental, derived from perpetual leases renewable every seven years. The present incumbent has nearly attained his 69th year. Chatteris is 13 miles from St. Ives, 15 from Wisbeach, and 21 from Cambridge.

The mansion and glebe lands may be viewed on application to the vender and the various tenants, and particulars may be obtained at the Angel and Talbot Inns, Peterborough; at the White Hart and Bell Hotels, Ely; University Arms, Cambridge; The Angel and Star Hotels, Oxford; Hen and Chickens, Birmingham; Queen's Arms Hotel, Liverpool; Royal Hotel, Manchester; Bush, Bristol; of Messrs. GILLER and SON respectfully announce they are instructed by the trustees of the will of the late Mr. William Hulbert, to submit to PUBLIC COMPETITION, at the Methuen Arms Inn, Corsham, on Tuesday, the 25th of June, 1844, at three o'clock in the afternoon, in one lot (subject to such conditions as will then be produced),

All that most desirable and compact property (with the freehold rectorial rent-charge on the same) known as the LYPIATT ESTATE, comprising a convenient Farm-house, suitable agricultural buildings, and about 200 acres of land, of which 145 acres are pasture of a superior quality for the dairy or grazing, and the residue arable; the whole in good cultivation, and occupied by Mr. John Hulbert, as yearly tenant.

SECRETARY—John Emerson, esq.
SOLICITORS—Messrs. Palmer, France, and Palmer.

THIS IS THE ONLY COMPANY who are bound by their deed of constitution not to dispute any Policy, unless they can prove that it was obtained by fraudulent misrepresentation; the great aim and object of the Society having been to render Life Policies COMPLETE SECURITIES and NEGOTIABLE DOCUMENTS, which shall owe their value to the certainty of the contracts upon which they are founded, and be independent of the liberality or caprice of those who shall be in the management of the affairs of the Company when the claims arise; and for this purpose the Company have, by a clause in their deed of constitution, unhesitatingly deprived themselves of the power of objecting to any policy, unless they undertake to prove that it was obtained from them by fraudulent misrepresentation. The regulations common to all other Life Companies, which make the validity of assurance contracts dependent upon the perfect correctness of the many statements required from a proposer for a Life Policy, and which have given rise to almost all the questions which have been argued in the courts, and to many extra judicial compromises, are thus entirely abrogated; and nothing but fraud, proved to have been committed against them, can vitiate a policy granted by this Company.

THIS IS THE ONLY COMPANY from whom the assured, on the mutual principle, receive the whole of the mutual accumulations and also a guarantee from the Shareholders for the sums assured.

THIS IS THE ONLY COMPANY who bind themselves to pay the sums in the Policies, although the debts for which they were effected shall have been liquidated before the claims arise, the Company considering it only just towards the assured, that where premiums have been received for assuring a given amount, that amount should be paid when it becomes due, without dispute or deduction, and they undertake to do so without reference to the state of the accounting between the assured and his debtor.

THIS IS ALMOST THE ONLY COMPANY who grant in favour of creditors whole world Policies, whereby the debt is secured, although the debtor should go beyond the limits of Europe.

The premiums, calculated according to the Carlisle tables, are lower than usual upon young lives, where participation in the profits is not required; and for short assurances, which, at the option of the assured, may be continued for life, the rates are as low as a due regard to complete security will permit.

TRIENNIAL ASCENDING SCALE TO ASSURE £100.

BY THE HALF-PREMIUM PLAN, only one-half of the premium for the first seven years is required, the other half being payable at the convenience of the assured; thus allowing a Policy to be continued for seven years at one-half of the usual rate, or to be dropped at one-half of the usual sacrifice, and entitling the assured, seven years hence, when loss of health may prevent him from effecting a new assurance, to continue a Policy at a rate of premium applicable to an age seven years younger. The Half-premium plan of assurance, as practised by this Company, thus enables persons to retain to their own use the one-half of the premiums for the first seven years, at 5l. per cent. interest. Thus, suppose the ordinary premium for an assurance of 500l. to be 10l., the first payment by the half-premium plan will be five guineas, being the one-half of the 10l., and interest for the retained half; and, if death should occur in the first year, the sum of 500l. would be paid less the 5l. retained. The assured may thus have the use for the first year of 5l.; for the second of 10l.; and so on till the end of the seventh year, when the retained sums, amounting to 35l., may either be repaid, or retained at 5l. per cent. interest until death, when the 35l. would be subtracted from the 500l. then payable by the Company.

MESSRS. FULLER and MARSH beg to inform their friends and the public that they have been honoured with instructions from the Proprietor to SELL by AUCTION, at the Mart, on Wednesday next, June 26, at 12 (unless previously disposed of by private contract), the PERPETUAL ADVOWSON and NEXT PRESENTATION to the VICARAGE of CHATTERIS, in the Isle of Ely, Cambridgeshire, producing a net annual income of 1,721*l.* 9s. 11d., and with the Mansion and Glebe Lands in hand may be considered of the annual value of about 1,850*l.* A portion of the income consists of 1,070*l.* 6s. 11d., receivable from a corn rent charge, (exempt from all parochial assessments by the Chatteris Enclosure Act,) in lieu of vicarial tithes, arising from 7,104 acres of exceedingly rich arable, pasture, and wood land, and the remainder arises from 341 acres of glebe land of first-rate quality in a high state of cultivation. The Vicarage house (a mansion adapted for a family of the first respectability) is of a modern elevation and pleasantly situate at a short remove from the High-street, and is surrounded by plantations and pleasure grounds, studded with timber of stately growth. This valuable and important advowson is a peculiarly eligible property, inasmuch as the corn rent charge is secured by Act of Parliament, is not subject to any deductions for parochial charges, and is only variable once in seven years (instead of every year, as by the Tithe Commutation Act), and then only in case the rector, vicar, or parishioners shall give notice as prescribed by the Act. Indeed, the income may be considered less fluctuating than from ordinary landed property, as it may be termed a nearly permanent rental, derived from perpetual leases renewable every seven years. The present incumbent has nearly attained his 69th year. Chatteris is 13 miles from St. Ives, 15 from Wisbeach, and 21 from Cambridge.

The mansion and glebe lands may be viewed on application to the vender and the various tenants, and particulars may be obtained at the Angel and Talbot Inns, Peterborough; at the White Hart and Bell Hotels, Ely; University Arms, Cambridge; The Angel and Star Hotels, Oxford; Hen and Chickens, Birmingham; Queen's Arms Hotel, Liverpool; Royal Hotel, Manchester; Bush, Bristol; of Messrs. New Publications.

THE FIRST PUBLICATION OF

THE VERULAM SOCIETY appeared on Thursday, the 20th instant. It consisted of No. I. of PRACTICAL REPORTS, comprising the MAGISTRATES' CASES or Easter Term last, by A. BITTLESTON and J. C. SYMONS, Esqrs. Barristers-at-Law.

N.B. The PRACTICAL REPORTS will consist of—I. MAGISTRATES' CASES, by A. BITTLESTON and J. C. SYMONS, Barristers-at-Law. II. PRACTICE CASES, by J. A. FOOTE, T. W. SAUNDERS, I. B. ASPINALL, and H. T. ATKINSON, Esqrs. Barristers-at-Law. III. REAL PROPERTY CASES, by R. G. WELFORD, G. GOLDSMITH, H. BAKER, T. MACAULEY, and G. T. ALLNUTT, Esqrs. Barristers-at-Law. IV. CROWN CASES in the Central Criminal Court and on Circuit; and NISI PRIUS PRACTICE CASES, by various Barristers. Each Case to be authenticated by the Reporter.

The purpose of these PRACTICAL REPORTS is to supply to the Profession, at a trifling cost, and in the convenient compass of a single volume, full Reports of all the Cases likely to be useful in ordinary practice, without the necessity that now exists of purchasing and carrying about with them a mass of cases that are seldom or never referred to, save in the Courts above, where ready access to them can be obtained.

The PRACTICAL REPORTS of the Verulam Society will, it is expected, supply to the members, at a cost of about twenty shillings per annum, the above information, which they can now only procure by an outlay of upwards of twenty pounds per annum.

They will be issued in Parts, as completed. Each Part will consist of 32 pages large octavo, and will contain nearly as much matter as one of the Parts of the ordinary Reports. The outside leaves will be cut off in binding, so that the sheets will be clean and continuous. It will be stamped, and sent free by post to the Subscribers in the country, as being cheaper and less troublesome than conveyance by parcel. They will form one annual volume.

The price will be, for each Part, to members of the Society, thirteen pence; to other persons, nineteen pence.

A PORTFOLIO for preserving the numbers of the current volume of the VERULAM SOCIETY REPORTS, so that they may be readily referred to, may be had at the Office, or by order from any Bookseller in the Country, Price 5s.

Members of the Society who may not have ordered the Reports are requested to do so forthwith. We subjoin a

PROSPECTUS OF THE VERULAM SOCIETY.

This Society is established to supply the members with Law Reports and Text Books at accessible prices.

It will consist of an indefinite number of Members.

Any person will be admitted a Member on payment of an entrance fee of 10*s.* 6*d.* before the 1st of August; after that date, the entrance fee will be 1*l.* 1*s.* (to defray the outlay of forming the Society and its current expenses), and an annual subscription of 2*l.* 2*s.* at the least. But payment of the subscription will not be required until the Society proceeds to publish some of the more costly of the works contemplated.

The Members will be entitled to all, or any of, the publications of the Society at the Society's prices. But if more in value be ordered than the amount of subscription will cover, the further sum must be transmitted with the order.

It should be expressly understood that the Members will incur no risks or responsibilities whatever. Arrangements have been made to avoid the difficulties of the Law of Partnership; thus: The works of the Society will be issued by the Publisher of the LAW TIMES at the Office of that Journal, on his single responsibility, as his own publication; but he will be secured from loss by the plan, which will invariably be followed, of sending to all the Members a notice of each publication as it is projected, with a form of order, and none will be published which does not thus previously secure subscribers enough to repay its expenses. By these means the Members will secure all the advantages of a sufficient supply of good and useful Law Books, at the lowest prices at which they can be produced, without incurring any of the risks and liabilities of partnership. This two-fold object is effectually accomplished by making it, in fact, a machinery for the publication of useful works by subscription.

The Society commences with the issue of the above series of Practical Reports, because its numbers do not yet justify entering on larger undertakings, and in the hope that, once in action, it will receive a large influx of supporters. As soon as the requisite number of Members is obtained, other more important works will be entered upon. One thousand Subscribers will justify the publication of a complete series of Reports of all the Courts, and 1,250 will permit the undertaking of a series of practical text-books at one-fourth of their present cost.

It should be understood that the whole of the subscription will be repaid in books, or the balance returned.

Persons desirous of joining the Society are requested to send their names and addresses, with the entrance fee, to the Publisher, at the Offices of the Verulam Society, 29. Essex-street, Strand.

Just published, price 14s.

IMPORTANT to the FASHIONABLE WORLD.—By far the most influential of all the graces that contribute to personal adornment is the hair. Its recovery, preservation, and improvement, proportionably concern the elegantes of a fashionable circle, and any information which will insure these desirable results will be hailed as an inestimable boon. The following extract from the letter of a respectable Chemist in Bridlington will be read with the highest interest:—

"A lady, a customer of mine, has found great benefit from the use of your Balm. About six months ago her hair nearly all fell off. I recommended her to try your Balm of Columbia, which she did. In the course of a few applications, the hair ceased to fall off. Before she had used one 3s. 6d. bottle it began to grow very profusely, and she has now a very beautiful head of hair.

"I am, gentlemen, yours respectfully,
"WM. SMITH,
"Chemist and Druggist, Market-place,
Bridlington.

"To Messrs. C. and A. Oldridge, March 13, 1844."

C. and A. OLDRIDGE'S BALM causes the hair to curl beautifully, frees it from scurf, and stops it from falling off, and a few bottles generally restore it again; it also prevents greyness. Price 3s. 6d., 6s., and 11s. per bottle. No other prices are genuine.

Oldridge's Balm of Columbia, 1, Wellington-street, the second house from the Strand.

CHOICE of a SERVANT.—DOMESTIC BAZAAR, 326, Oxford-street, corner of Regent's-circus, established 1830.—Families in want of good Servants will decidedly find their interest consulted by applying at the Bazaar, as domestics are waiting to be hired from ten to five, and to insure giving satisfaction, none but those of the best description are suffered to attend. The subscriber may select any servant likely to suit, who refers to the family with whom she last lived; and should inquiries not prove satisfactory, they may select others. This thoroughly straightforward method has been found to give universal satisfaction, and the farce of applying to tradespeople, and waiting an indefinite period, is therefore obviated, as at this establishment a respectable servant can be procured immediately. Fee for one servant, 2s. 6d.; for as many as may be required, 14s. per annum.

The style of cut and make of every garment are guaranteed equal to the first and most expensive houses at the West End, and for cash payments a saving of 40 per cent. will be effected, and will be found to the wearer much cheaper than the inferior garments made up by puffing Slopsellers and Houses, at prices to astonish and delude the public, which description of goods are entirely excluded from this Establishment. 52, King William-street, City.—Established 1832.

NECROLOGY.

MR. O'HANLON.

We record with much regret the death of Mr. O'Hanlon, counsel to the Irish office. It appeared that the deceased swallowed a fish-bone on Sunday week, which, after some difficulty, passed into the stomach, but unfortunately it caused irritation in the lower intestines, which were at the time predisposed to inflammation. On the Tuesday evening a violent inflammation came on, and in the middle of the night mortification, and the next day death. Mr. O'Hanlon was still in the full vigour of manhood, and his healthful and athletic appearance gave all earthly promise of a long life.—Observer.

THIS IS THE ONLY COMPANY who are bound by their deed of constitution not to dispute any Policy, unless they can prove that it was obtained by fraudulent misrepresentation; the great aim and object of the Society having been to render Life Policies COMPLETE SECURITIES and NEGOTIABLE DOCUMENTS, which shall owe their value to the certainty of the contracts upon which they are founded, and be independent of the liberality or caprice of those who shall be in the management of the affairs of the Company when the claims arise; and for this purpose the Company have, by a clause in their deed of constitution, unhesitatingly deprived themselves of the power of objecting to any policy, unless they undertake to prove that it was obtained from them by fraudulent misrepresentation. The regulations common to all other Life Companies, which make the validity of assurance contracts dependent upon the perfect correctness of the many statements required from a proposer for a Life Policy, and which have given rise to almost all the questions which have been argued in the courts, and to many extra-judicial compromises, are thus entirely abrogated; and nothing but fraud, proved to have been committed against them, can vitiate a policy granted by this Company.

THIS IS THE ONLY COMPANY from whom the assured, on the mutual principle, receive the whole of the mutual accumulations, and also a guarantee from the Shareholders for the sums assured.

THIS IS THE ONLY COMPANY who bind themselves to pay the sums in the Policies, although the debts for which they were effected shall have been liquidated before the claims arise; the Company considering it only just towards the assured, that where premiums have been received for assuring a given amount, that amount should be paid when it becomes due, without dispute or deduction; and they undertake to do so without reference to the state of the accounting between the assured and his debtor.

THIS IS ALMOST THE ONLY COMPANY who grant in favour of creditors whole world Policies, whereby the debt is secured, although the debtor should go beyond the limits of Europe.

The premiums, calculated according to the Carlisle tables, are lower than usual upon young lives, where participation in the profits is not required; and for short assurances, which, at the option of the assured, may be continued for life, the rates are as low as a due regard to complete security will permit.

TRIENNIAL ASCENDING SCALE TO ASSURE £100.

Age.	1st Three Years.			2nd Three Years.			3rd Three Years.			4th Three Years.			Remainder of Life.

60	4	8	11	5	17	4	7	5	9	8	14	2	10	2	7

BY THE HALF-PREMIUM PLAN, only one-half of the premium for the first seven years is required, the other half being payable at the convenience of the assured; thus allowing a Policy to be continued for seven years at one-half of the usual rate, or to be dropped at one-half of the usual sacrifice, and entitling the assured, seven years hence, when loss of health may prevent him from effecting a new assurance, to continue a Policy at a rate of premium applicable to an age seven years younger. The Half-premium plan of assurance, as practised by this Company, thus enables persons to retain to their own use the one-half of the premiums for the first seven years, at 5*l*. per cent. interest. Thus, suppose the ordinary premium for an assurance of 500*l*. to be 10*l*., the first payment by the half-premium plan will be five guineas, being the one-half of the 10*l*., and interest for the retained half; and, if death should occur in the first year, the sum of 500*l*. would be paid less the 5*l*. retained. The assured may thus have the use for the first year of 5*l*.; for the second of 10*l*.; and so on till the end of the seventh year, when the retained sums, amounting to 35*l*., may either be repaid, or retained at 5*l*. per cent. interest until death, when the 35*l*. would be subtracted from the 500*l*. then payable by the Company.

COMMISSION.—The Solicitor who transacts a Policy with this Company, is considered as the Agent during its whole currency, and receives commission upon all future premiums, by whomsoever they may be paid.

CAPITAL INVESTMENTS. — FIVE elegant FAMILY RESIDENCES on the Bishop of London's PADDINGTON ESTATE.

MESSRS. RUSHWORTH and JARVIS are directed by the Trustees, for the benefit of the Creditors of Mr. James Steel, to SELL by AUCTION, at Garraway's, on FRIDAY, July 26, at Twelve, in Five Lots, valuable LEASEHOLD PROPERTY, held for ninety-two years, at ground-rents, comprising nearly the whole of Park-place, near Paddington-green. The houses present an elegant elevation, of a very ornamental character, in the terrace style. They are all finished in an expensive manner, and are fit for occupation; uniting most of the improvements in houses in this highly-respectable neighbourhood, and they will be found to possess great attractions to those who would invest in good house property. Park-place is midway between Paddington-green and Maida-hill West, and the houses are numbered 9 to 13, inclusive.

May be viewed till the sale, on application at No. 10; and printed particulars had of Messrs. MULLINS and PADDISON, Solicitors, 1 Great James-street, Bedford-row; at Garraway's; and of RUSHWORTH and JARVIS, Saville-row, Regent-street, and 19, Change-alley, Cornhill.

SAFE and ELIGIBLE INVESTMENT. — A RENT-CHARGE producing a net Income of 412*l.* a year, as secure as the Government Land-tax, being a first Annual Charge upon the Lands of a whole Parish collected under the Powers of the Act for the Commutation of Tithes.

MESSRS. RUSHWORTH and JARVIS have the honour to announce to capitalists that they will SELL by AUCTION, at Garraway's, on FRIDAY, July 26, at Twelve, in One Lot, an INCOME, averaging during the last three years 412*l.* per annum, after payment of every out-going, including collector's poundage; it is, therefore, confidently recommended to those capitalists who are desirous of increased income beyond what the funds yield, and who have wisely resolved to realize at the extraordinary prices of the day. The nature of the security may be easily ascertained on reference to those parishes where the tithe has been commuted, when it will be found that the collector of the payment in lieu of tithes takes priority of the landlord, with full powers of distress, therefore assimilating the income, in the security of its title and certainly of collection, to the government land-tax.

The particular property now to be offered for sale comprises the rent-charge secured upon the whole parish of Constantine, in Cornwall. The income is remarkably steady, the fluctuation during the last three years being only 6*l.* on the whole parish, regulated by the annual corn averages as published in the London Gazette.

This valuable property is leasehold under the Dean and Chapter of Exeter, the particulars of which, with every information, may now be obtained at the Office of Messrs. RUSHWORTH and JARVIS, Land Agents and Surveyors, Saville-row, Regent-street, and 19, Change-alley, Cornhill, of whom printed particulars may be obtained fourteen days prior to the sale; also of WILLIAM STEPHENS, Esq., Solicitor, 30, Bedford-row; and of Messrs. EVERY and SON, Solicitors Exeter.

IN YORKSHIRE.—RAVENSTHORPE, near Thirsk.—A MANORIAL ESTATE, with a Domain of 1513 acres, within a Ring Fence, abounding with every description of Game, in a fine sporting part of the North Riding, and close to the far-famed Hambleton Training Grounds, with an excellent Modern Residence, seated on an Eminence, surrounded by Scenery which, for beauty and extent, may be compared to the finest parts of Devonshire; with a good Trout Stream running through the Estate. The distance only 25 miles from York, and within 14 hours' ride of London.

MESSRS. RUSHWORTH and JARVIS have the honour to announce for SALE by AUCTION, at Garraway's, on Friday, August 2, at twelve (unless an acceptable offer shall be previously made by Private Contract), the important and truly desir ble FREEHOLD ESTATE, consisting of the Manor of Ravensthorpe, with its courts leet and courts baron, and a domain of 1513 acres of excellent arable, rich meadow, pasture, and wood land, situate in the parish of Feliskirk, 4½ miles from the capital market town of Thirk, and 10 from Northallerton. The residence, which is placed on the slope of an eminence, has a south aspect, and is sheltered from the north by high banks of wood and thriving plantations; was erected a few years since, in the most substantial and costly manner, of stone, and is suited to a family of moderate requirements. The stabling and out-offices are very superior, and combine every accommodation for a gentleman's hunting and shooting establishment and being within reach of several packs of hounds (some of which occasionally meet upon the estate), and the adjacent moors affording excellent grouse and woodcock shooting, every attraction is presented to a lover of field sports; and to the admirer of nature there are to be enjoyed, from the elevated position of the residence, views of surpassing beauty, overlooking the picturesque village of Boltby, with the rich meadows belonging to the estate which lie in the valley beneath, and the more distant lands interspersed and fringed by woods and plantations, bounded on the east by the bold range of the Hambleton hills, whereon are the far-famed training-grounds, whilst the distant moors, rising majestically in the back-ground, enclose the whole scene, and form one vast amphitheatre, with hill and dale, wood and valley, broken into the most imposing and picturesque scenes. The estate is divided into several compact farms, with excellent homesteads and commodious buildings, with a water corn-mill, 19 houses and cottages with gardens, with the inn in the village of Boltby, all erected of stone. The residence, with the woods, extensive moor, and a small portion of the lands, are in hand; the remainder is occupied by a highly respectable tenantry, at rents amounting to per annum 900*l.* which might be materially increased under judicious management without diminishing the contentment which at present exists throughout this enviable domain.

The estate may be viewed on application to Mr. DYER, at West Acre Lodge, near Thirsk, of whom printed particulars, with plans, may be obtained 21 days previous to the sale, and may also be had at the inns of adjacent towns; and in London of Mr. C. K. DYER, 4, New [illegible]-street; Messrs. LOWE, SWEETING, and BYRNE, Solicitors, 22, Southampton-buildings, Chancery-lane; and at the offices of RUSHWORTH and JARVIS, Land Surveyors and Auctioneers, Saville-row, Regent-street, and 19, Change-alley, Cornhill.

ON THE CROWN ESTATE.—IMPORTANT INVESTMENT, comprising that noble edifice, the EGYPTIAN HALL, PICCADILLY, yielding an income of upwards of 1,200*l.* a year, after payment of ground-rent.

MESSRS. RUSHWORTH and JARVIS are directed by the Executors of the late George Lackington, esq. to SELL by AUCTION, at Garraway's, on FRIDAY, July 26, at Twelve (unless an unexceptionable offer should previously be made by Private Contract), the UNEXPIRED TERM of LEASE, for twenty-eight years, at a ground-rent, of the distinguished PREMISES so long celebrated as the Egyptian Hall, presenting a frontage of fifty-seven feet to Piccadilly, with an elevation singularly bold and attractive. The present rental is derived from two elegant front shops, with convenient apartments attached, let to Messrs. Barry and to Mr. Reeve, as permanent tenants; the remainder is occupied by the several caterers for public amusement and instruction, comprising the Grand Hall, the Bazaar-room, the Lecture-room, and various ante-rooms; immense warehouses range through the basement and store-house, kitchen, cellaring, &c. approached from Piccadilly through a gateway, ten feet wide. This most valuable pile of buildings is centrical to all parts of the Court-end of the metropolis; it is close to New Bond-street, St. James's-street, near to the royal Palace, the club-houses, and every place of fashionable resort; it presents unrivalled attractions for a national museum for the display of works of art or improvements in manufactures, and is well worthy the attention of a government distinguished for its encouragement of every object or undertaking calculated to elevate the public taste and provide for the rational enjoyment of the people. To the capitalist this sale opens a source of revenue increasing with the rapid extension of the metropolis, already the great focus of attraction to the inhabitants of the provinces, who are hourly borne towards the centre of amusement by the rail roads, which now radiate to every great city and town in the kingdom.

The premises may be viewed, by permission of the tenants, on application to the porter; and printed particulars with lithographic plans may shortly be obtained at Garraway's; of THOMAS NIAS, Esq. Solicitor, 5, Copthall-court, Throgmorton-street; and of RUSHWORTH and JARVIS, Saville-row, Regent-street, and 19, Change-alley, Cornhill.

LEA and PERRINS' WORCESTERSHIRE SAUCE.

Prepared from a Recipe of a Nobleman in the County.

"One of the most piquant inventions of this luxurious and epicurean age is Lea and Perrins' Worcestershire Sauce, adapted to Fish, Flesh, Fowl, and Soup; giving a zest far superior to the long-established favourites, more wholesome and of less cost."—Naval and Military Gazette, April 8, 1843.

Copy of a testimonial from Capt. Hosken.

"The cabin of the Great Western has been regularly supplied with Lea and Perrins' Worcestershire Sauce, which is adapted for every variety of dish; from turtle to beef, from salmon to steaks—to all of which it gives a famous relish. I have great pleasure in recommending this excellent sauce to captains and passengers for its capital flavour, and as the best accompaniment of its kind, for a voyage.

(Signed) "JAMES HOSKEN."

IMPORTANT to the FASHIONABLE WORLD.—By far the most influential of all the graces that contribute to personal adornment is the hair. Its recovery, preservation, and improvement, proportionably concern the élégantes of a fashionable circle, and any information which will insure these desirable results will be hailed as an inestimable boon. The following extract from the letter of a respectable chemist in Bridlington will be read with the highest interest:—

"A lady, a customer of mine, has found great benefit from the use of your Balm. About six months ago her hair nearly all fell off. I recommended her to try your Balm of Columbia, which she did. In the course of a few applications, the hair ceased to fall off. Before she had used one 3s. 6d. bottle it began to grow very profusely, and she has now a very beautiful head of hair.

"I am, gentlemen, yours respectfully,
"WM. SMITH,
"Chemist and Druggist, Market-place,
Bridlington.

"To Messrs. C. and A. Oldridge, March 13, 1844."

C. and A. OLDRIDGE'S BALM causes the hair to curl beautifully, frees it from scurf, and stops it from falling off, and a few bottles generally restore it again; it also prevents greyness. Price 3s. 6d., 6s., and 11s. per bottle. No other prices are genuine.

LANCASHIRE COUNTY RATE.—By a recent parliamentary return it appears that, in 1841, the population of this county being 1,667,054 persons, its acreage 1,130,240 acres, and its number of inhabited houses 289,184, or one house in every four acres, and three-quarters of an acre to every person, the total valuation to the county-rate was 6,192,067*l*.; and the amount of county-rate, in 1842, was 41,328*l*., or 1½d. in the pound on the valuation; 8¾d. per acre, or 6d. per head on the whole population of the county. It will scarcely be believed that, according to the valuation, Lancashire is the richest county in England; the valuation of the whole of Yorkshire being only 3,783,438*l*., and that of Middlesex, which approaches nearest to Lancashire, reaches only 6,047,886*l*., or 144,181*l*. less than that of this county! Lancashire pays a county-rate of 8¾d. per acre, while the average amount for all England is only 4¾d. per acre.—Manchester Guardian.

James Allen Jackson, of Kingston-upon-Hull, has been appointed one of the perpetual commissioners for the town and county of Kingston-upon-Hull, and a riding of the county of York, for taking the acknowledgments of deeds by married women under the Abolition of Fines and Recoveries Act.

The Clergy assisted in all proceedings with respect to their induction, as well as in their attempts to augment small Livings. Likewise they are aided in erecting District Churches and Chapels, and in all things connected therewith. Incumbents may obtain Curates, and Candidates for Ordination may procure Titles to Orders. Chaplains procured, and Lists of vacant chaplaincies obtained. Private Tutors procured for Candidates for Ordination, as also for young men intended for the Universities and for the Church. Clergymen desirous of obtaining Pupils may procure them through the Registry. The Wives and Widows and the Orphan Daughters of Clergymen may likewise procure Pupils. Endowments for Repairs of Churches and Parsonage Houses found. Information supplied as to the Universities, Church Colleges, and Schools. Masters and Mistresses found for all descriptions of Church Schools; also all particulars supplied as to Church Societies and the Public Charities of the country. To carry all these and various other objects into effect, four classes of proceedings are adopted by the Clerical Registry:

First.—Annual Subscribers of Ten Shillings to the Registry are entitled to receive (gratuitously) written replies and information, in answer to every question, in writing, addressed by them to it.

Second.—The Clerical Registry's Advertising Sheet appears on the 15th of every month, and contains lists of Advowsons and next Presentations required, and on sale; Livings for Exchange; Endowed and Consecrated Chapels wanted, and for sale, or to be let; Curacies and Curates desired; Titles to Orders required and offered; Chaplaincies vacant and wished for; Public Schoolmasters and Professors wanted; Tutorships and Private Pupils desired; and Loans required on Clerical Securities, and Money to be advanced on such property. This Monthly Sheet is sold at Five Shillings per annum. Advertisements may be inserted therein at Sixpence per line. No advertisement is inserted for less than Five Shillings; and all advertisements must be sent by the 12th of each month.

Third.—With regard to Clerical business and Agency generally, every matter intrusted to the "Clerical Registry" must be paid for according to arrangements made between the applicants and the Office; but all charges will be on a very moderate and proportioned scale—from 1½ to 2 per cent. on Sales, Purchases, and Exchanges.

Fourth.—Subscribers of Two Pounds per annum, to be paid in advance, will receive weekly, and oftener, throughout the year, the earliest possible intelligence of all Vacant Livings in the gift of the Crown or of the Lord Chancellor; so that those who are subscribers for this special object will be able to make application for the same at least a week, and sometimes a fortnight, earlier than those who do not so subscribe.

Office hours from Ten to Five daily. All communications, on every subject, to be addressed (prepaid) "To the Director of the Clerical Registry," 14, Surrey-street, Strand, London.

MR. SINGLE will SELL by AUCTION, at the Mart, on Tuesday, August 20, an excellent FREEHOLD ESTATE, comprising above 320 Acres, most delightfully situate about two miles from that fashionable watering-place, Sidmouth, seven from Honiton, fifteen from Exeter, and twelve from the Great Western Railway, in the rich vale of Sidbury, and the salubrious and mild climate of South Devon, beautifully undulated and highly picturesque, possessing park-like rural and woodland scenery. THIS IS THE ONLY COMPANY who are bound by their deed of constitution not to dispute any Policy, unless they can prove that it was obtained by fraudulent misrepresentation; the great aim and object of the Society having been to render Life Policies COMPLETE SECURITIES and NEGOTIABLE DOCUMENTS, which shall owe their value to the certainty of the contracts upon which they are founded, and be independent of the liberality or caprice of those who shall be in the management of the affairs of the Company when the claims arise; and for this purpose the Company have, by a clause in their deed of constitution, unhesitatingly deprived themselves of the power of objecting to any policy, unless they undertake to prove that it was obtained from them by fraudulent misrepresentation. The regulations common to all other Life Companies, which make the validity of assurance contracts dependent upon the perfect correctness of the many statements required from a proposer for a Life Policy, and which have given rise to almost all the questions which have been argued in the courts, and to many extra-judicial compromises, are thus entirely abrogated; and nothing but fraud, proved to have been committed against them, can vitiate a policy granted by this Company.

THIS IS THE ONLY COMPANY from whom the assured, on the mutual principle, receive the whole of the mutual accumulations, and also a guarantee from the Shareholders for the sums assured.

THIS IS THE ONLY COMPANY who bind themselves to pay the sums in the Policies, although the debts for which they were effected shall have been liquidated before the claims arise; the Company considering it only just towards the assured, that where premiums have been received for assuring a given amount, that amount should be paid when it becomes due, without dispute or deduction; and they undertake to do so without reference to the state of the accounting between the assured and his debtor.

THIS IS ALMOST THE ONLY COMPANY who grant in favour of creditors whole world Policies, whereby the debt is secured, although the debtor should go beyond the limits of Europe.

The premiums, calculated according to the Carlisle tables, are lower than usual upon young lives, where participation in the profits is not required; and for short assurances, which, at the option of the assured, may be continued for life, the rates are as low as a due regard to complete security will permit.

TRIENNIAL ASCENDING SCALE TO ASSURE £100.

Age.	1st Three Years.			2nd Three Years.			3rd Three Years.			4th Three Years.			Remainder of Life.

BY THE HALF-PREMIUM PLAN, only one-half of the premium for the first seven years is required, the other half being payable at the convenience of the assured; thus allowing a Policy to be continued for seven years at one-half of the usual rate, or to be dropped at one-half of the usual sacrifice, and entitling the assured, seven years hence, when loss of health may prevent him from effecting a new assurance, to continue a Policy at a rate of premium applicable to an age seven years younger. The Half-premium plan of assurance, as practised by this Company, thus enables persons to retain to their own use the one-half of the premiums for the first seven years, at 5*l.* per cent. interest. Thus, suppose the ordinary premium for an assurance of 500*l.* to be 10*l.*, the first payment by the half-premium plan will be five guineas, being the one-half of the 10*l.*, and interest for the retained half; and, if death should occur in the first year, the sum of 500*l.* would be paid less the 5*l.* retained. The assured may thus have the use for the first year of 5*l.*; for the second of 10*l.*; and so on till the end of the seventh year, when the retained sums, amounting to 35*l.*, may either be repaid, or retained at 5*l.* per cent. interest until death, when the 35*l.* would be subtracted from the 500*l.* then payable by the Company.

Mr. Grimstone's commercial intercourse enables him to vend his foreign goods in the most genuine condition; and he pledges himself to continue the manufacture of every article in its pure and pristine state. Testimonials of undoubted authority from the highest characters, proving the efficacy of his EYE SNUFF, may be seen at the warehouse, as above, and in the third edition of his Almanack, 1843 and 1841. GRIMSTONE'S EYE SNUFF, sold in canisters, 8d. 1s. 3d. 2s. 4d. 4s. 4d. 8s. and 15s. 6d. each.

To Wm. Grimstone, Esq. 434, Oxford Street.

26th Aug. 1843.

Sir,—I was a sufferer for seven years, both eyes having been so swollen as to cause blindness. Among the many medical gentlemen who attended me was the famous oculist, Dr. ALEXANDER; indeed, I do believe my case was beyond all their skill. "Physic, bleeding, blistering, with a seton, and all kinds of lotions, but no relief," till chancing one day being led by your house, 39 Broad Street, Bloomsbury, my guide inquired if I had tried your Eye Snuff, on which I purchased a 1s. 3d. canister, opened it in the shop, took some, and was greatly relieved before I reached my home. I can with truth assert, and make oath if required to do so, that it was your Eye Snuff cured me. Shall be happy to answer any inquiry. I continue to use it as frequently as other snuff.—(Third testimony to the above-named.)

I am, Sir, yours gratefully,
L. S. BREWER,
Dress Maker, 18, Silver Street,
late of 3, Edge Terrace, Kensington Gravel-pits.

36, Upper Stamford Street, Oct. 3, 1842.

Sir,—During my sedentary occupation as a literary man, I was subject to excruciating pains in the head, which frequently caused blindness for a time. I have taken your Eye Snuff for the last two years; and from my first using it, have been free from pain, and see without the use of glasses at this time. G. W. M. REYNOLDS.

Any of the above sizes can be sent through the post, on receiving a cash order, postage included.

IMPORTANT to the FASHIONABLE WORLD.—By far the most influential of all the graces that contribute to personal adornment is the hair. Its recovery, preservation, and improvement, proportionally concern the élégantes of a fashionable circle, and any information which will insure these desirable results will be hailed as an inestimable boon. The following extract from the letter of a respectable chemist in Bridlington will be read with the highest interest:—

"A lady, a customer of mine, has found great benefit from the use of your Balm. About six months ago her hair nearly all fell off. I recommended her to try your Balm of Columbia, which she did. In the course of a few applications, the hair ceased to fall off. Before she had used one 3s. 6d. bottle it began to grow very profusely, and she has now a very beautiful head of hair.

"I am, gentlemen, yours respectfully,
"WM. SMITH,
"Chemist and Druggist, Market-place,
Bridlington.

"To Messrs. C. and A. Oldridge, March 13, 1844."

C. and A. OLDRIDGE'S BALM causes the hair to curl beautifully, frees it from scurf, and stops it from falling off, and a few bottles generally restore it again; it also prevents greyness. Price 3s. 6d., 6s., and 11s. per bottle. No other prices are genuine.

Oldridge's Balm of Columbia, 1, Wellington-street, the second house from the Strand.

CAPITAL INVESTMENTS. — FIVE elegant FAMILY RESIDENCES on the Bishop of London's PADDINGTON ESTATE.

MESSRS. RUSHWORTH and JARVIS are directed by the Trustees, for the benefit of the Creditors of Mr. James Steel, to SELL by AUCTION, at Garraway's, on FRIDAY, July 26, at Twelve, in Five Lots, valuable LEASEHOLD PROPERTY, held for ninety-two years, at ground-rents, comprising nearly the whole of Park-place, near Paddington-green. The houses present an elegant elevation, of a very ornamental character, in the terrace style. They are all finished in an expensive manner, and are fit for occupation; uniting most of the improvements in houses in this highly-respectable neighbourhood, and they will be found to possess great attractions to those who would invest in good house property. Park-place is midway between Paddington-green and Maida-hill West, and the houses are numbered 9 to 13, inclusive.

May be viewed till the sale, on application at No. 10; and printed particulars had of Messrs. MULLINS and PADDISON, Solicitors, 1 Great James-street, Bedford-row; at Garraway's; and of RUSHWORTH and JARVIS, Saville-row, Regent-street, and 19, Change-alley, Cornhill.

SAFE and ELIGIBLE INVESTMENT.—A RENT-CHARGE producing a net Income of 412*l.* a year, as secure as the Government Land-tax, being a first Annual Charge upon the Lands of a whole Parish collected under the Powers of the Act for the Commutation of Tithes.

MESSRS. RUSHWORTH and JARVIS have the honour to announce to capitalists that they will SELL by AUCTION, at Garraway's, on FRIDAY, July 26, at Twelve, in One Lot, an INCOME, averaging during the last three years 412*l.* per annum, after payment of every out-going, including collector's poundage; it is, therefore, confidently recommended to those capitalists who are desirous of increased income beyond what the funds yield, and who have wisely resolved to realize at the extraordinary prices of the day. The nature of the security may be easily ascertained on reference to those parishes where the tithe has been commuted, when it will be found that the collector of the payment in lieu of tithes takes priority of the landlord, with full powers of distress, therefore assimilating the income, in the security of its title and certainly of collection, to the government land-tax.

The particular property now to be offered for sale comprises the rent-charge secured upon the whole parish of Constantine, in Cornwall. The income is remarkably steady, the fluctuation during the last three years being only 6*l.* on the whole parish, regulated by the annual corn averages as published in the London Gazette.

This valuable property is leasehold under the Dean and Chapter of Exeter, the particulars of which, with every information, may now be obtained at the Office of Messrs. RUSHWORTH and JARVIS, Land Agents and Surveyors, Saville-row, Regent-street, and 19, Change-alley, Cornhill, of whom printed particulars may be obtained fourteen days prior to the sale; also of WILLIAM STEPHENS, Esq., Solicitor, 30, Bedford-row; and of Messrs. EVERY and SON, Solicitors, Exeter.

POSTPONED TO THE NINTH OF AUGUST.

IN YORKSHIRE.—RAVENSTHORPE, near Thirsk.—A MANORIAL ESTATE, with a Domain of 1513 acres, within a Ring Fence, abounding with every description of Game, in a fine sporting part of the North Riding, and close to the far-famed Hambleton Training Grounds, with an excellent Modern Residence, seated on an Eminence, surrounded by Scenery which, for beauty and extent, may be compared to the finest parts of Devonshire; with a good Trout Stream running through the Estate. The distance only 25 miles from York, and within 11 hours' ride of London.

MESSRS. RUSHWORTH and JARVIS have the honour to announce for SALE by AUCTION, at Garraway's, on Friday, August 9, at twelve (unless an acceptable offer shall be previously made by Private Contract), the important and truly desirable FREEHOLD ESTATE, consisting of the Manor of Ravensthorpe, with its courts leet and courts baron, and a domain of 1513 acres of excellent arable, rich meadow, pasture, and wood land, situate in the parish of Feliskirk, 4½ miles from the capital market town of Thirk, and 10 from Northallerton. The residence, which is placed on the slope of an eminence, has a south aspect, and is sheltered from the north by high banks of wood and thriving plantations; was erected a few years since, in the most substantial and costly manner, of stone, and is suited to a family of moderate requirements. The stabling and out-offices are very superior, and combine every accommodation for a gentleman's hunting and shooting establishment, and being within reach of several packs of hounds (some of which occasionally meet upon the estate), and the adjacent moors affording excellent grouse and woodcock shooting, every attraction is presented to a lover of field sports; and to the admirer of nature there are to be enjoyed, from the elevated position of the residence, views of surpassing beauty, overlooking the picturesque village of Boltby, with the rich meadows belonging to the estate which lie in the valley beneath, and the more distant lands interspersed and fringed by woods and plantations, bounded on the east by the bold range of the Hambleton hills, whereon are the far-famed training-grounds, whilst the distant moors, rising majestically in the back-ground, enclose the whole scene, and form one vast amphitheatre, with hill and dale, wood and valley, broken into the most imposing and picturesque scenes. The estate is divided into several compact farms, with excellent homesteads and commodious buildings, with a water corn-mill, 19 houses and cottages with gardens, with the inn in the village of Boltby, all erected of stone. The residence, with the woods, extensive moor, and a small portion of the lands, are in hand, the remainder is occupied by a highly respectable tenantry, at rents amounting to per annum 900*l.* which might be materially increased under judicious management without diminishing the contentment which at present exists throughout this enviable domain.

The estate may be viewed on application to Mr. DYER, at West Acre Lodge, near Thirsk, of whom printed particulars, with plans, may be obtained 21 days previous to the sale, and may also be had at the inns of adjacent towns; and in London of Mr. C. K. DYER, 4, New Broad-street; Messrs. LOWE, SWEETING, and BYRNE, Solicitors, 22, Southampton-buildings, Chancery-lane; and at the offices of RUSHWORTH and JARVIS, Land Surveyors, &c., Saville-row, Regent-street, and 19, Change-alley, Cornhill.

ON THE CROWN ESTATE.—IMPORTANT INVESTMENT, comprising that noble edifice, the EGYPTIAN HALL, PICCADILLY, yielding an income of upwards of 1,000*l.* a year, after payment of ground-rent.

MESSRS. RUSHWORTH and JARVIS are directed by the Executors of the late George Lackington, esq. to SELL by AUCTION, at Garraway's, on FRIDAY, July 26, at Twelve (unless an unexceptionable offer should previously be made by Private Contract), the UNEXPIRED TERM of LEASE, for twenty-eight years, at a ground-rent, of the distinguished PREMISES so long celebrated as the Egyptian Hall, presenting a frontage of fifty-seven feet to Piccadilly, with an elevation singularly bold and attractive. The present rental is derived from two elegant front shops, with convenient apartments attached, let to Messrs. Barry and to Mr. Reeve, as permanent tenants; the remainder is occupied by the several caterers for public amusement and instruction, comprising the Grand Hall, the Bazaar-room, the Lecture-room, and various ante-rooms; immense warehouses range through the basement and store-house, kitchen, cellaring, &c. approached from Piccadilly through a gateway, ten feet wide. This most valuable pile of buildings is centrical to all parts of the Court-end of the metropolis; it is close to New Bond-street, St. James's-street, near to the royal Palace, the club-houses, and every place of fashionable resort; it presents unrivalled attractions for a national museum for the display of works of art or improvements in manufactures, and is well worthy the attention of a government distinguished for its encouragement of every object or undertaking calculated to elevate the public taste and provide for the rational enjoyment of the people. To the capitalist this sale opens a source of revenue increasing with the rapid extension of the metropolis, already the great focus of attraction to the inhabitants of the provinces, who are hourly borne towards the centre of amusement by the rail-roads, which now radiate to every great city and town in the kingdom.

The premises may be viewed, by permission of the tenants, on application to the porter; and printed particulars may be obtained at Garraway's; of THOMAS NIAS, Esq. Solicitor, 5, Copthall-court, Throgmorton-street; and of RUSHWORTH and JARVIS, Saville-row, Regent-street, and 19, Change-alley, Cornhill.

Bedfordshire.—Very eligible Freehold Estates, in the parish of Sandy, cultivated as Garden Ground, and offering to Trustees safe and profitable Landed Investments, not to be influenced by any change in the Corn-laws; also a Freehold Family Residence and other property, at Caldecote. The whole Tithe-free and Land-tax Redeemed.

MESSRS. RUSHWORTH and JARVIS are instructed by the Mortgagees, with the concurrence of the Devisees in Trust under the will, to SELL by AUCTION, at Garraway's, early in the month of August, in several Lots (unless previously disposed of by private contract), a very desirable FREEHOLD PROPERTY; comprising 170 acres of land, with two farm homesteads, situate at Beeston, in the parish of Sandy, a district proverbial for the remarkable richness and fertility of the soil, and highly valuable as garden ground; a portion of which was late in the occupation of the deceased, and the remainder is let on long leases to responsible tenants, at almost incredibly high rents, and substantial additional advantages to the property may be looked for from the newly-projected line of railway, direct from London to York, which it is contemplated will pass over this estate. There are likewise several cottages, a wheelwright's shop, and brewhouse, at Beeston-green; also a spacious family residence, with possession, in a fine sporting country, and having extensive stabling and outbuildings; a licensed ale-house, eleven cottages near thereto, and four acres of luxuriant garden-ground adjoining, situate at Caldecote, only one mile distant from the preceding property, and equidistant with the capital market-town of Biggleswade, eight miles from the county town of Bedford, and only forty-seven miles from London, on the Great North-road.

Printed particulars, with plans, may be obtained on the premises, at Caldecote; at the principal inns in the neighbouring towns: and in London of Messrs. BARKER, ROSE, and NORTON, Solicitors, 50, Mark-lane; of Messrs. GREGORY, FAULKNER, GREGORY, and BOURDILLON, Solicitors, 1, Bedford-row; at Garraway's; and at the offices of RUSHWORTH and JARVIS, Land-surveyors and Auctioneers, Saville-row, Regent-street, and 19, Change-alley, Cornhill.

NETLEY ABBEY, SOUTHAMPTON.

MR. FREDERICK CHINNOCK has been instructed to SELL by AUCTION, at the Auction Mart, City, on Friday, August 2, 1844, at One o'clock precisely, in lots, the above substantially-built VILLAS, which are ready for immediate occupation, with the exception of decoration, which will be left to the taste of the purchaser. They are of modern elevation, with projecting roofs, and faced with the celebrated Exbury white brick, and are so arranged that they can be easily converted into one establishment, if required. The land is charmingly formed by Nature for the erection of Villa Residences, and will be so lotted. It is situated close to Netley Abbey, immediately facing Cadlands, the magnificent seat of Andrew Berkeley Drummond, esq. It is approached by a capital road, distant two miles from Southampton, and within about three hours' ride of the metropolis.

IMPORTANT to the FASHIONABLE WORLD.—By far the most influential of all the graces that contribute to personal adornment is the hair. Its recovery, preservation, and improvement, proportionably concern the élégantes of a fashionable circle, and any information which will insure these desirable results will be hailed as an inestimable boon. The following extract from the letter of a respectable chemist in Bridlington will be read with the highest interest:—

"A lady, a customer of mine, has found great benefit from the use of your Balm. About six months ago her hair nearly all fell off. I recommended her to try your Balm of Columbia, which she did. In the course of a few applications, the hair ceased to fall off. Before she had used one 3s. 6d. bottle it began to grow very profusely, and she has now a very beautiful head of hair.

"I am, gentlemen, yours respectfully,

"WM. SMITH,

"Chemist and Druggist, Market-place, Bridlington.

"To Messrs. C. and A. Oldridge, March 13, 1844."

C. and A. OLDRIDGE'S BALM causes the hair to curl beautifully, frees it from scurf, and stops it from falling off, and a few bottles generally restore it again; it also prevents greyness. Price 3s. 6d., 6s., and 11s. per bottle. No other prices are genuine.

Oldridge's Balm of Columbia, 1, Wellington-street, the second house from the Strand.

PATENT.—To be DISPOSED OF, or worked for the benefit of the Parties without involving a Partnership, a valuable Patent Right, just obtained, for an article already in general and increasing use and demand. This Company, established by Act of Parliament, affords the most perfect security in a large paid-up Capital, and in the great success which has attended it since its commencement in 1834,

Its Annual Income being upwards of £72,000.

In 1841, the Company declared an addition to the Shareholders of one-half of their Stock, and also added a Bonus of 2l. per cent. per annum on the sum insured to all policies of the participating class from the time they were effected.

The Bonus added to policies from March, 1834, to the 31st Dec., 1840, is as follows:—

Sum Assured.	Time Assured.	Sum added to Policy.
£5,000	6 Yrs. 10 Months.	£683 6s. 8d.
5,000	6 Years	600 0 0
5,000	4 Years	400 0 0
5,000	2 Years	200 0 0

The Premiums nevertheless are on the most moderate scale, and only one-half need be paid for the first Five Years, where the Insurance is for Life.

Every information will be afforded on application to the Resident Directors, EDWARD BOYD, Esq., and E. LENNOX BOYD, Esq., of No. 8, Waterloo-place, Pall-mall, London.

BRITANNIA LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANY, No. 1, Prince's-street, Bank, London. Empowered by special Act of Parliament, 4 Vict. cap. 9.

HALF CREDIT RATES OF PREMIUM.

Persons assured according to these rates are allowed credit (without security) for half the amount of the first seven Annual Premiums, paying interest thereon at the rate of five per cent. per annum, with the option of paying off the Principal at any time, or having the amount deducted from the sum assured when the Policy becomes a claim.

Policies may thus be effected at lower rates than are generally required for the term of seven years only; whilst the holders have the same security for the payment of their claims whenever death may happen, as if they paid double the amount of premium, which would be charged for assurances effected in the usual way.

Extract from the Half Credit Rates of Premium.

NECROLOGY.

SIR JOHN MAXWELL.—We regret to announce that this venerable and highly esteemed baronet died suddenly on Wednesday morning, at Pollok House. Sir John, according to custom, was about to take a morning drive in his carriage, which, at half-past eight, was drawn up at the door for his reception; and while he was on the threshold going out, he fell down and almost instantly expired. Mr. Wallace, M.P. for Greenock, was seated in the carriage at the time waiting the arrival of his venerable friend. Sir John succeeded his father as seventh baronet in 1785, and has thus enjoyed the family honours for 59 years. After the Reform Bill became the law of the land, Sir John was elected the first member for Paisley. Subsequently, after his retirement from the representation of Paisley, on the death of Sir M. S. Stewart, in 1836, he contested the county of Renfrew with Mr. Houston, but was unsuccessful. Sir John Maxwell is succeeded in his title and estates by his son Mr. John Maxwell, who has represented in Parliament successively the counties of Renfrew and Lanark. The present baronet was, a few years ago, married to a daughter of the late Earl of Elgin.—Glasgow Paper.

MR. RALPH LAMBTON.—We regret we have to announce the death of the above gentleman, who has been, since February, 1837, confined to his couch, from the effects of a fall while hunting. The venerable gentleman expired on Monday last, at his seat, Horton House, Durham. Mr. Lambton was son of General and Lady Susan Lambton, daughter of the Earl of Strathmore, and uncle of the late Earl of Durham. By his demise the following families are placed in mourning—those of Lords Durham, Grey, Strathmore, and Jersey; W. and Hedworth Lambton, esqrs., the Hon. Colonel Cavendish, &c. Mr. Lambton was well known in the sporting world as having for many years been a master of hounds in the north, which he only gave up at the time of his accident, although of a great age, and sold his hounds to Lord Suffield for a higher price than was ever given before.

IMMENSE IMPROVEMENT IN THE VALUE OF PROPERTY IN BIRKENHEAD.—We are informed by a contemporary of Saturday last, that, since the passing of the Birkenhead Dock Bill, the property of this go-ahead locality has considerably improved in value, and that cottage property, in particular, has increased 50 per cent. There is every probability, too, we learn from the same authority, of a bed of coal being found in the neighbourhood of Leasowe Castle (although how the fact has been arrived at, now that belief in the virtue of the divining-rod is exploded, we know not), and prompt measures are about to be taken for rendering it productive. We trust that these flattering anticipations will be fulfilled, although we really must suggest that there is no need of these puffing announcements, which are apt to make the public suspect that there is some bolstering going on. Advances, by the bye, of 50 per cent. in a week, are sometimes followed by disappointment, and burnt fingers to the speculative. We have no wish however, to deter fair investment at Birkenhead or elsewhere, but would advise circumspection and moderate prices.—Liverpool Standard.

RISE IN VALUE OF GROUND NEAR GLASGOW.—On Thursday week the lands of Stobcross, to the west of Finnieston, and extending from the Clyde northward to near Dumbarton road, were sold by public roup, at the price of 3s. per square yard, imperial measure. These lands extend to about sixty-three Scotch or about eighty imperial acres, which being about 387,000 square yards, makes the price amount to somewhere about 58,000*l.*; but as the purchaser pays the auction duty, which will be about 1*l.* 7s. as well as half of the conveyance stamp, the price will actually amount to upwards of 60,000*l.* We understand that these lands were purchased by the late Mr. Phillips (by whose trustees they have been sold), in the year 1817, for about 3,700*l.* making a rise in value of upwards of 56,000*l.*—Scotch Reformers' Gazette.

SALE OF CWM CELYN AND BLAINA IRON WORKS.—This fine mineral property was sold by Mr. White, of Coleford, at the Westgate Hotel, Newport, on Wednesday se'nnight, for 87,000*l.* The purchaser is Mr. Stodhert, of Bath, for self and some of the leading shareholders of the recent company, who will, we sincerely hope, in these better times for iron manufacturers, find it relatively as good a bargain as the Ebbw Vale and Sirhowy plant is proving to the enterprising Messrs. Darby.—The Cambrian.

SALE OF ESTATES.—During the last two or three months there has been a sale of landed property in Fife which is quite unprecedented. In that time there have been sold—the lands of Pitlessie, for 19,750*l.* to the Dowager Lady Glasgow; Newbiggin, to Mr. Johnson, for, we believe, about 19,500*l.*; Teuchats, to the College of St. Andrew's, for 4,000*l.*; Myreside, 4,000*l.* to Mr. Currie, Leven; Pitmedden for about 5,000*l.*; Kinglassie for nearly the same sum. Within a short period also the estates of Balgarvie, Radernie, and Smiddygreen, in this county, have been purchased.—Fifeshire Herald.

HAWICK, JULY 30.—EXTRAORDINARY RESULTS OF THE FACTORY BILL.—[From a Correspondent.]—In consequence of the stringent measures imposed by the Factory Bill on the labour of young persons employed in mills, and the trammels thereby laid upon the free use of capital and industry, a stimulus has been given to men of genius to invent a machine whereby the labour of juveniles may in a great measure be superseded, and capitalists relieved from the inroads of legislative aggression. To accomplish this mighty work several machines staggered into existence, but none of them answered the purpose, until Messrs. Melrose and Sons introduced their celebrated piecing machine, a number of which are in full and satisfactory operation in all our principal woollen mills, while a number are ordered for other parts of Scotland as well as England. The chief merit of this machine consists in its slow and unerring movements, its cheapness and simplicity, its applicability to all sorts of wool, as well as the great improvement on the finished yarns, and the immense abridgement of labour — one man and two girls, with this machine, can execute more work than was done by the old method with two men and ten girls! What will the supporters of the Factory Bill say to those individuals whose labour has been displaced by this invention? Surely they cannot refuse to compensate those whom their humanity has deprived of the means of subsistence. This must either be done, or a refractory Bill must be enacted to interdict the use of improved machinery.

Suffolk.—Somerleyton Hall, a first-rate Mansion, standing in a handsomely timbered Park, ornamented with a noble Avenue of Lime Trees, together with numerous Farms, the whole containing nearly 2,900 acres; several extensive Manors, and two valuable Advowsons.

MR. W. W. SIMPSON has received instructions from the Lord Sydney Godolphin Osborne to offer for SALE by AUCTION, at the Mart, on Thursday, Aug. 29, at twelve o'clock, one of the most extensive and valuable FREEHOLD ESTATES which has been submitted to public competition for many years. It comprehends Somerleyton Hall, a substantial family mansion, supposed to have been erected by Sir John Jernegan in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, and forming a handsome specimen of the architecture of that period. Near the mansion, which stands in the centre of the estate, in a park of about 120 acres, are the beautiful plantations of Wickerwell and Summer-house Water, embellished with ornamental trees, evergreens, and shrubs of luxuriant growth, and two extensive sheets of water surrounded by sloping lawns and pleasing walks, interspersed with fishing seats, judiciously placed in the most picturesque situations. There is another lake on the estate, whereof above eighty-six acres belong to this property, and on which is the productive Decoy of Ashby. The estate is admirably adapted for the rearing and preservation of game in all its varieties, and includes Mutford Wood, containing eighty-two acres, celebrated as one of the best pheasant covers in the country, and the lakes furnish excellent fishing. The entire estate contains 2,868 acres, consisting chiefly of fertile arable and productive pasture land, including nearly 430 acres of marshes, which are invaluable to the upland portions of the estate. The residences, cottages, and farm buildings are of a superior description, and in excellent repair. The land is in a high state of cultivation, and the tenantry generally unexceptionable. The present rental, amounting to 2,728l. per annum is very moderate. Gorleston Ferry, the water passage over the river Yare, at Southtown, belongs to the estate, and yields a considerable income, but is at present let at a low rent. Connected with the property are the Advowsons of Somerleyton and Ashby, extending over 2,424 acres of titheable land, the rent-charge arising from which amounts to 555l. per annum. There is a handsome residence and offices, with extensive pleasure-grounds, plantations, and gardens, on the rectory of Somerleyton, together with forty-six acres of superior glebe land, and the incumbent is in his 62nd year. The manorial property extends over the hundreds or half-hundreds of Mutford and Lothingland, with the rights, royalties, and franchises appertaining thereto, including the wreck along the sea-coast in those hundreds, the income of which has on an average of twenty-one years amounted to upwards of 330l. per annum. The property has the advantage of a navigable communication with the harbours of Lowestoft and Yarmouth, and also with the city of Norwich. It is situate about five miles from Lowestoft, seven from Yarmouth, eleven from Beccles, and twenty-two from Norwich, and will soon be brought within six hours' journey of the metropolis by means of the railway.

Particulars and plans may now be had (price 1s. each) of G. J. NICHOLSON, Esq. Solicitor, Raymond-buildings, Gray's-inn; of EDMUND NORTON, Esq. Solicitor, Lowestoft; at the Mart; and of Mr. W. W. SIMPSON, 18, Bucklersbury.

The lease of the tithes is renewable every seven years according to custom, and the last renewal took place at Michaelmas, 1843. The arable lands on this estate, which are of an exceedingly convertible and productive description, are highly cultivated, and adapted to the growth of every variety of white straw and green crop. The marshes are of excellent grazing quality, and are abundantly supplied with fine water in the driest seasons. The farm is in the occupation of Mrs. Sarah Allen and her sons, William and Robert (whose family have held it upwards of half a century), to whom a new lease for fourteen years was granted at Michaelmas, 1842, at an annual rent of 710l., which includes the tithe rent-charge of 74l. per annum upon the 190 acres.

MESSRS. RUSHWORTH and JARVIS are instructed by the Mortgagees, with the concurrence of the Devisees in Trust under the will, to SELL by AUCTION, at Garraway's, on Friday, August 30, at Twelve, in fifteen lots (unless previously disposed of by Private Contract), a very desirable FREEHOLD PROPERTY, comprising 170 acres of Land, with two Farm Homesteads, situate at Beeston, in the parish of Sandy, a district proverbial for the remarkable richness and fertility of the soil, and highly valuable as garden-ground; a portion of which was late in the occupation of the deceased, and the remainder is let on long leases to responsible tenants, at almost incredibly high rents; and substantial additional advantages to the property may be looked for from the newly-projected line of railway direct from London to York, which it is contemplated will pass over the estate.

SUFFOLK.—SOMERLEYTON HALL, a first-rate Mansion, standing in a handsomely-timbered park, ornamented with a noble avenue of lime-trees, together with numerous farms, the whole containing nearly two thousand nine hundred acres; several extensive manors, and two valuable advowsons.

MR. W. W. SIMPSON has received instructions from the Lord Sydney Godolphin Osborne to offer for SALE by AUCTION, at the Mart, on Thursday, August 29, at twelve, one of the most extensive and valuable FREEHOLD ESTATES which has been submitted to public competition for many years. It comprehends SOMERLEYTON HALL, a substantial Family Mansion, supposed to have been erected by Sir John Jernegan in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, and forming a handsome specimen of the architecture of that period. Near the mansion, which stands in the centre of the estate in a park of about one hundred and twenty acres, are the beautiful plantations of Wicker Well and Summer House Water, embellished with ornamental trees, evergreens, and shrubs of luxuriant growth, and two extensive sheets of water, surrounded by sloping lawns and pleasing walks, interspersed with fishing-seats, judiciously placed in the most picturesque situations. There is another lake on the estate, whereof above eighty-six acres belong to this property, and on which is the productive Decoy of Ashby.

The estate is admirably adapted for the rearing and preservation of game in all its varieties, and includes Mutfor Wood, containing eighty-two acres, celebrated as one of the best pheasant coverts in the country, and the lakes furnish excellent fishing.

The entire estate contains two thousand eight hundred and sixty-eight acres, consisting chiefly of fertile arable and productive pasture land, including nearly four hundred and thirty acres of marshes, which are invaluable to the upland portions of the estate. The residences, cottages, and farm buildings are of a superior description, and in excellent repair. The land is in a high state of cultivation, and the tenantry generally unexceptionable. The present rental, amounting to 2,728*l.* per annum, is very moderate.

Gorleston Ferry, the water passage over the river Yare, at Southtowns, belongs to the estate, and yields a considerable income, but is at present let at a low rent.

Connected with the property are the Advowsons of Somerleyton and Ashby, extending over two thousand four hundred and twenty-four acres of titheable land, the rent-charge arising from which amounts to 555*l.* per annum.

There is a handsome residence and offices, with extensive pleasure-grounds, plantations, and gardens, on the Rectory of Somerleyton, together with forty-six acres of superior glebe land, and the incumbent is in his 62nd year.

The manorial property extends over the hundreds or half-hundreds of Mutford and Lothingland, with the rights, royalties, and franchises appertaining thereto, including the wreck along the sea-coast in those hundreds, the income of which has, on an average of twenty-one years, amounted to upwards of 330*l.* per annum.

The property has the advantage of a navigable communication with the harbours of Lowestoft and Yarmouth, and also with the city of Norwich. It is situate about five miles from Lowestoft, seven from Yarmouth, eleven from Beccles, and twenty-two from Norwich, and will soon be brought within six hours' journey of the metropolis by means of the railway.

Particulars and plans may now be had (price 1s. each) of G. J. NICHOLSON, Esq. Solicitor, Raymond-buildings, Gray's Inn; of EDMUND NORTON, Esq. Solicitor, Lowestoft; at the Mart; and of Mr. W. W. SIMPSON, 18, Bucklersbury.

ESSEX.—On the borders of Suffolk.—"The Auberies," an important Freehold Mansion and Estate, comprising about 1,400 acres, situate within a mile of the navigable river Stour, which divides the counties, and two miles only from the excellent market-town of Sudbury. The Kelvedon station on the Eastern Counties Railway brings the estate within three hours and a half of the metropolis.

MR. W. W. SIMPSON has received directions from Colonel Merrick to offer for SALE by AUCTION, at the Mart, on Wednesday, the 25th September, at Twelve o'clock, that valuable and much-admired FREEHOLD ESTATE called "The Auberies," with its modern mansion of handsome elevation, seated in a park of 120 acres of delightfully varied and undulating surface, studded with majestic timber, and commanding most extensive and interesting views of the surrounding country. It is environed by pleasure-grounds and plantations of luxuriant growth, in which is an ornamental sheet of water, bridge, and bath-house. The mansion, which opens to a beautiful lawn, flower-garden, and terrace-walk, contains on the principal floor handsome reception and conservatory, en suite, 150 feet in length, and which communicate with an elegant drawing-room. The sleeping-apartments and domestic accommodation are of a most perfect description, and the whole admirably adapted for the residence of a family of distinction. The stabling, coach-houses, and out-offices, are of a commensurate extent. The principal lodge-entrance to the park is on the high London road. The kitchen-gardens, which are of considerable extent, are walled, and planted with the choicest fruit-trees, grapery, and gardener's cottage. The demesne portion of the estate is in hand, and, including the park, consists of about 650 acres. The remainder of the property contains about 750 acres, and is let in four farms to tenants of the first class. The farm-houses, agricultural buildings, &c. upon the entire estate are adapted to the occupations; and the lands, which are highly cultivated, are of deep staple, and, with few exceptions, are of a convertible and productive description. The estate is well stocked with game in all its varieties, and the country is hunted by the fox-hounds of Richard Marriott, esq.

Descriptive particulars of the estate are in preparation. Mr. SIMPSON, however, in the meantime, invites an immediate inspection of the mansion and lands, which may be viewed by cards, on application to Messrs. STEADMAN and SON, Solicitors, Sudbury; Messrs. COX and WILLIAMS, Solicitors, 64, Lincoln's-inn-fields; Messrs. WHARTON and FORD, Solicitors, 64, Lincoln's-inn-fields; Mr. CHARLES H. BRANWHITE, Gestingthorpe, near Halstead (who will shew the estate), and to Mr. W. W. SIMPSON, 18, Bucklersbury.

MEETING of the LEGAL PROFESSION.—The time has arrived when it behoves every member of the Legal Profession to unite for the protection of their mutual and general interests.

The formidable and noble combination of the medical profession against the aggression of "quackery" is an example worthy of imitation, and ought to shame us for our apathy and supineness.

My Lord Brougham's libellous attack on the Profession on the 17th instant, in his letter to the Morning Herald, ought to be indignantly and instantly repelled, and measures at once taken to suppress the introduction of his "Agents." The fall of Conveyancing will follow that of Common Law, if legal "quackery" be not at once checked. Accountants, touters, and agents already rob the Profession of thousands annually, without this fresh immunity of my Lord Brougham.

Such members, therefore, of the Profession who are willing to co-operate in forming an Association for the protection of the general interests of the Profession are invited to meet on Monday Evening next, at Six o'clock precisely, at No. 6, Bedford-row, to adopt such measures as may be deemed expedient.

LEGAL PERIODICALS.—We regret to find that our quarterly contemporary, The Law Magazine, has been discontinued. Although, perhaps, it had rather declined in spirit of late, yet there were very few numbers in which we did not find much instruction and entertainment. We are somewhat surprised that it has ceased to appear, as the current is setting strongly in favour of periodicals, in legal as well as in all other branches of literature. Twelve years ago The Law Magazine and ourselves were the only publications of this nature, other than the law reports; now there are five or six, we believe; many of which certainly give ample paper and print for the money: and a legal periodical of one kind or other will soon come to be a sort of necessity to every lawyer. This partly arises from the many recent changes in the law, but also from the strong tendency of the present age to have information at the earliest moment possible.—Legal Observer.

At the Lancaster Assizes, Mr. Palmer, the Town Clerk of Preston, performed his 111th journey to Lancaster Assizes. Mr. Palmer completed his 71st year in February last. He was elected to the office of coroner on the 12th of November, 1799.—Liverpool Standard.

Railway Accidents.—The report of the railway department of the Board of Trade for the past year furnishes the following comparison of railroad accidents, attended with danger to the passenger public, since the department has been in operation:—

Years.	Accidents.	Persons killed.	Persons hurt.
1840 { Estimated by doubling the last five months	56	44	262
1841	29	25	72
1842	10	5	14
1843	5	3	3

Of the three persons killed in 1843, one only, it is stated, was a passenger not being himself to blame. These are figures which speak for themselves.

CORRESPONDENCE.

TRANSFER OF PROPERTY ACT.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

Sir,—This statute intended beneficial alterations, but the improper haste in passing it appears to me to have caused a looseness of language very much to be censured.

The second section seems to inflict the lease for a year stamp upon every conveyance of freehold. We know that in small matters a grant was frequently adopted where there was a lease in existence.

The ninth section designed a benefit to a mortgagor, but it is a problem whether it will not create a further inconvenience. It seeks to remove the frequent cause of doubt whether the legal estate passed by the mortgagee's will or went to his heir, and also to avoid the expense occasioned by the legal estate getting into an infant. To attain these ends, it enacts that the mortgagee's executor or administrator may convey the estate under given circumstances, viz. first, possession of the land must not have been taken by virtue of the mortgage; second, there must be no action or suit pending; third, the principal money and interest due must be paid. Now, when we find in a title that the estate had been mortgaged, and reconveyed by the mortgagee's personal representative, of course extrinsic evidence of full compliance with the three requisites must be adduced. Proof, in fact, must be given of, in effect, three negatives, for even the last-mentioned is, I apprehend, to be established by something more than a receipt for a given sum indorsed on the reconveyance, and the fact to be established will be, that no more was due than was paid. Unless the amount stated to be received corresponds with the precise total of principal and interest for the whole period of the loan, the receipt does not afford in itself the slightest security, nor will any averment in the deed as to the amount insure safety, since the mortgagee's heir or devisee being no party, of course would not be estopped. Part payment of principal is frequent, payment of interest as it accrues invariable, so that the amount positively due is an essential ingredient, and, if not established, the estate is in the heir or devisee. I really fear the effect of that section will be, that prudent conveyancers will require the concurrence of both real and personal representative as much as ever. How shall we, twenty years hence, shew possession had never been taken? how shew that no suit had been pending? We cannot expect bare allegation will satisfy, for upon these facts it depends whether the conveyance is or is not waste parchment.

Your obedient servant,

J. Brooks Ward.

A POINT OF PRACTICE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

Sir,—In reply to the question propounded by your correspondent, Mr. Leigh, of Heywood, as to the solicitor properly entitled to prepare a lease proposed to be granted of an estate in mortgage, I beg to say, that the right to do so, as it appears to me, belongs to the solicitor of the mortgagee; and for this reason, that without the concurrence of his client, the lessee would become a mere tenant at will to the mortgagee, his sole remedy being, either to redeem the mortgage or bring an action on the lessor's covenant for quiet enjoyment. (See Sugden on Vend. & Purch.)

The only doubt which occurs to my mind upon the subject is, whether, inasmuch as a lessee is a purchaser pro tanto, his solicitor is not the proper party in all cases to prepare the lease; but, assuming this right to belong to the solicitor of the lessor, in accordance with the usual practice, where an estate is free from mortgage, then it seems to me that, in this case, seeing that the concurrence of the mortgagee is essentially necessary to the validity of the lease, he may be considered with a view to Mr. Leigh's question, as the lessor, and his solicitor consequently entitled to prepare it.

I am, Sir, yours obediently,

J. N. Crampton.

Rochester, August 19, 1844.

PRACTICE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

Sir,—"The point of practice" to which your attention and that of your readers is called by the letter of Mr. Robert Leigh, of Heywood, which appeared in your last number, struck me as being so completely free from doubt, that I read the letter twice, to assure myself that there was not some "point" in it which I had overlooked on the first perusal. I believe his inquiry is simply, whether the solicitors of the mortgagor or of the mortgagee are entitled to prepare leases of mortgaged premises?

Undoubtedly the latter. The mortgagor, having parted with the legal estate, and possessing only the equity of redemption, can have no power to grant leases (unless stipulated for, such a stipulation being, I apprehend, very unusual and highly objectionable), consequently, the solicitors of the mortgagor can have no right to the preparation of leases.

Your obedient servant and subscriber,

Henry Walker.

We have received some more letters on the vexata quæstio of the Stamps on Transfers of Mortgage. Lector writes:—

Your correspondents seem all to have overlooked the Statute 1 & 2 Geo. 4, c. 55. It enacts, in short, that deeds relating to property in Ireland shall be stamped according to the stamp duties of Ireland, and deeds relating to property in Great Britain according to the stamp duties of Great Britain; and any deed or instrument duly stamped pursuant to that Act "shall not be liable to any stamp duty by reason of the same also containing any covenant, agreement, or obligation for the payment of any money, at whatever place such money may be made payable."

Therefore, in my opinion, if an original mortgagor join with the mortgagee in transferring a mortgage, and a further sum be advanced, no duty beyond the extra ad valorem is payable in respect of the mortgagor giving by the same deed a covenant for payment of the entire sum.

It may be said that, under this very statute, there still arises the old point, whether the transfer be "duly stamped;" but I take it the statute in question must have some meaning, and must be construed, together with all the others, as one law.

A Subscriber thus remarks:—

With respect to the question, whether any progressive duty attaches to mortgage transfers, where further money is secured; if this question rested solely on the Act of Parliament (3 Geo. 4, c. 117), its solution would depend on the construction put on the Act with regard to the transfer duty. By the first section all ad valorem and other duties, which were imposed on any transfer, &c., of any mortgage by the 55th Geo. 3, c. 184, which relates to Great Britain, and the 56th Geo. 3, c. 56 (which relates to Ireland), were repealed, and by the second section a duty of 35s. was imposed upon any transfer, &c. in Great Britain, provided no further sum of money or stock was added to the principal money or stock already secured; and, by the same section, it was enacted, that where any such transfer, &c. should contain 2,160 words or upwards, then for every entire quantity of 1,080 words, above the first 1,080 words, a progressive duty of 25s. should be paid. Then follow, in the same section, the words, "And if any further sum of money or stock shall be added to the principal money or stock already secured, the ad valorem duty on mortgages, payable under the said recited Acts respectively, shall be charged only in respect of such further money or stock;" but not a word is said of any progressive duty in this latter alternative. Now, as it has been decided in the case of Doe v. Gray, 4 Neville & Manning, 719, that "the transfer duty on mortgages is imposed only where no further sum is advanced," it would seem to follow by analogy that the progressive duty was imposed only where no further sum was advanced. But it is to be observed that the question whether or not the transfer duty was to be paid where a further sum was advanced, was never distinctly settled, until it was decided in the negative in Doe v. Gray in the year 1835. Now, in that, being the same case, it was held that "the three 1*l*. progressive stamps were sufficient; thereby denoting the opinion of the Court that the progressive stamp was requisite. I believe the invariable practice in such cases, ever since the passing of the 3rd Geo. 4, c. 117, has been to use the progressive stamp; and Mr. Coventry in his very elaborate discussion on "Transfer of Mortgage," in his treatise on the Stamp Laws, favourable as he is to the popular side, does not say a syllable in behalf of its exemption. Upon the whole I think it would be very rash to attempt to escape the 20s. progressive duty whenever the quantity of words would appear to call for it. In regard to the lease for a year stamp, I believe that most of the reasoning in the foregoing part of this letter would apply to that question; and my opinion is, that whenever a lease for a year would have been necessary to pass the fee but for the Act 4 & 5 Vict. c. 21, it would be prudent to use the lease for a year stamp correspondent to the amount of ad valorem duty, payable when no transfer stamp is necessary; but where the transfer stamp is used, then a 35s. lease for a year stamp: and such, I believe, has always been the practice.

A correspondent signing himself A. B. thus replies to our query on the subject of threatening letters with the view of extorting money.

The Law Times of the 10th inst. contains (in reference to a threatening letter therein described) a query of yours, as to whether an indictment could be sustained against the author of such letter; it being a letter demanding money under a threat of legal proceedings, the point for consideration is, whether an indictment can be supported as for a "threatening letter," or as for a letter "demanding money."

It is clear an indictment is not in any case sustainable, for sending a threatening letter, without the threat contained in the letter is of such a nature as to make it indictable; and, according to the dictum of Ellenborough, C. J. in Rex v. Southerton (6 East, 126, 140), the threat in the letter under consideration is not of that description. In the case quoted, his lordship is reported to have said, "There is a distinction between threats of actual violence against the person or such other threats as a man of common firmness cannot stand against, and other sorts of threats;" and that to uphold an indictment "the threat must be of such a nature as is calculated to overcome the ordinary freewill of a firm and prudent man, and induce him from fear to part with his money, but that a mere threat to bring an action is not of such a kind but that a man of ordinary firmness might resist it."

From the above it appears that the threat in this letter is not indictable, and although a threat of any kind, for the purpose of obtaining money, is highly immoral; yet when (as in this case) it is capable of being, and ought to be resisted by any man of common firmness, it seems it is not to be considered of an indictable nature.

But as for "sending or delivering a letter demanding money," I think an indictment may be effectually sustained on the stat. 4 Geo. 4, c. 54, s. 3, that statute makes it felony for "any person knowingly and wilfully sending or delivering any letter or writing with or without any name or signature subscribed thereto, or with a fictitious name or signature, demanding money," and subjects the offender (at the discretion of the court) to transportation for life, or not less than seven years, or imprisonment and hard labour not exceeding seven years.

The above section certainly appears to admit of the construction that it extends to all letters "demanding money" sent or delivered by the offender knowingly and wilfully, and whether accompanied with a threat of bodily harm or "other sort of threat" or not; and I agree with you in believing that if one or two of the threatening-letter-gentlemen were prosecuted and exposed it would act as a caution to others, and prove of much benefit and advantage to the profession and public generally.

G. M. D, thus addresses us on the subject of the "Transfer of Property Act."

On reading the print of the "Transfer of Property Act" in your valuable columns, a question suggested itself to me, viz. that as by that Act all contingent limitations as such are abolished, whether all such must in futuro, as executory devises or springing uses take effect within a life or lives in being and twenty-one years afterwards, in accordance with the old rule of law laid down as to those interests.

I shall be glad to be enlightened upon the subject.

E. C. an attorney of some experience, thus comments on a subject which has engaged much attention in these columns—that of Sham Attorneys:—

ACCOUNTANTS AND BASTARD LAWYERS.

Sir,—I shall be very happy to co-operate with the "Attorney" who mentions the case of the accountants and their travellers. That system is not confined to the country, but is practised extensively in town. I believe the Profession in London alone are deprived of thousands of pounds annually by accountants, consulting agents, and bastard lawyers of one sort or another, and the Profession may thank themselves. First, there is a certain apathy and supineness about the Profession which is unaccountable; for every other profession has a society for its protection. Even last week a party was introduced to me by a client, and I found an action had been commenced against him, and an accountant had entered an appearance, for which he charged him 20s. Then came the declaration; but at the pleading part of the business the accountant was estopped. I also found this accountant had prepared the man a release, for which he had charged 30s. and the man declared to me that it had cost him 15s. per diem for eating and drinking in going about with this accountant and some coadjutor to obtain a few signatures. I thought of reporting this case to the Law Institution; but I fear it would be useless. The Profession want a society for its general protection, and to be open to the Profession generally. The Profession can complain loudly enough one to the other, but appear to be reluctant to unite, when, if united, they would form a body quite powerful enough to protect their own interests and character.

There ought to be a well-understood rule amongst the Profession, that in any matter of a legal nature, no intercourse should be held with an accountant. For instance, if a party is sued, and he sends an accountant, give him no audience: either have the defendant in person, or his attorney. Then prosecute two or three cases where accountants render themselves amenable, and a check would soon be given to these malpractices.

Surely the Government attacks on the Profession are sufficiently alarming, without other encroachments; and since the patronage of medical quackery by the executive has been openly avowed, what guarantee have we that legal quackery will not be the next enactment?

I shall be happy to join in forming a society for the protection of the interests of the Profession generally, and for the prosecution and extermination of these bastard lawyers. Let accountants keep to accounts; but let lawyers alone attend to the law (for which they pay handsomely by servitude and fees), being thereunto duly licensed and authorized.

A Country Solicitor thus writes on the recent regulation of the Inns of Court:—

Pray annihilate the iniquitous "New regulations of the Inns of Court," and crush the attempted monopoly of the Bar thereby endeavoured to be established.

The benchers of the Inner Temple, and, as your valuable publication informs us, of the other Inns of Court also, have now "ordered, that from and after Hilary Term, no attorney at law, solicitor, writer to the signet, or writer of the Scotch courts, proctor, notary public, parliamentary agent, clerk in Chancery, or other officer in any court of law or equity, whether such clerk be articled or in receipt of a salary or other remuneration for his services, shall be allowed to keep commons in the hall of this society, available for the purpose of being called to the Bar, until such person, being an attorney, shall have taken his name off the roll, and until he, and every other person above named and described, shall have ceased to act or practise as such attorney, &c. &c. &c. And that no commons which shall, from and after this present Term, be kept by a person so disqualified as aforesaid, whether he be already, or may hereafter be admitted a member of this society, shall be allowed to him as a qualification for the Bar."

Is this, Mr. Editor, a fair measure of justice to the Profession and public at large? who will thus be deprived of the services of many men of first-rate talent, possessed of every requisite to constitute barristers of the first order, but unable to live in idleness whilst eating the prescribed Terms; the pecuniary ability to do which now appears a condition precedent to the right of installation as students.

It is a well-known fact, that up to the time of the aforesaid "order" coming forth, many attorneys struck off the roll and acting as clerks to attorneys, were keeping Terms in order to become advocates, and after having been permitted to toil for two or three years without objection, are now, without warning, tyrannically doomed to an unjust and unmerited disappointment by the emanation of a splenetic order, which, if persisted in, will be a means of monopolizing the profession of the Bar for the benefit of the wealthy aristocrats of the law; whilst those who are necessitated to live by the sweat of their brow are debarred from a just right of competing with their more fortunate brethren for the attainment of those honours which are by our law and constitution professed to be as much within the reach of a plough-boy as the son of a prince.

The examples of shining talent, industry, and indefatigable perseverance exhibited by many of our most able lawyers of low origin, are too numerous and notorious for repetition, and sufficient, one would think, to have induced the benchers, were they men of ordinary understanding, to refrain from promulgating exclusive "orders," which, I assure you, Mr. Editor, cause disgust and nausea throughout the meaner branch of the Profession.

N.B. The above "order," as regards solicitors, attorneys, and proctors, is an old friend with a new face. I remember that whilst I was serving my year with a London agent, about twenty years since, the same order was in existence.

LANDS OF BLACKWELLS AND PARKHOUSE.—We understand that this property has just been purchased from Mr. Gladstone, of Fasque, by our spirited countryman, Mr. Matheson, of Achany, M.P. a gentleman who, with his immense wealth, bids fair to work wonders in our northern shires. The lands of Parkhouse are situated close to Dingwall, and admirably adapted for feuing. The new proprietor will, we presume, soon effect a complete metamorphosis on the place, equally advantageous to the townsfolk as to himself.—Inverness Courier.

Full particulars may be had of Messrs. BROOKS and GREEN, Estate Agents, Surveyors, and Auctioneers, 28, Old Bond-street, at whose gallery a cosmoramic view of the estate may be seen.

MESSRS. BROOKS and GREEN have instructions to DISPOSE of the LEASE of a delightful COTTAGE ORNEE, most beautifully situate on the banks of the Thames, four miles from Town, surrounded by six acres of pleasure-grounds and gardens, with a terrace-walk fronting the river, unequalled for extent and beauty. The house, which is built in a most tasteful manner, finished and decorated without the least regard to expense, contains a suite of reception-rooms about eighty feet long, with stained glass windows, and decorations of great beauty and value, numerous best and secondary bed-chambers, domestic offices, stabling, green-house, and every accommodation for the reception of a nobleman's family; at the same time the house is so constructed as to be kept up with a very small establishment, and from its proximity to Town, and most beautiful and healthy situation, is rendered particularly desirable. The rent is only 200*l.* per annum, and a very small premium is required for the lease of eighteen years.

Apply to Messrs. BROOKS and GREEN, Estate-agents and Auctioneers, 28, Old Bond-street, at whose offices a cosmoramic view of the property may be seen.

CHEAP LIGHT.—EDWARD PRICE and CO. Patentees and Sole Manufacturers of the COMPOSITE CANDLES, respectfully call the attention of the Public to the fact that although the price of these is somewhat higher than that of ordinary mould candles, they are in reality much cheaper than these latter; one real Composite candle giving the same quantity of light as two of the moulds. They require no snuffing, and burn more brilliantly than the best wax. The purposes of economy and luxury are therefore both served at the same time by the use of these candles. Parties intending to try them for the first time are earnestly requested to take care that they are served in the shops with "PRICE'S PATENT CANDLES;" They are sold by most of the respectable tallow chandlers throughout the kingdom, and wholesale to the trade by EDWARD PRICE and CO. Belmont, Vauxhall; and by PALMER and CO. Sutton-street, Clerkenwell.

LEGAL PROTECTIVE ASSOCIATION.
—At a GENERAL MEETING of the Profession held at the Gray's-inn Coffeehouse, Holborn, on Monday, the 2nd day of September instant, pursuant to public notice.
DAVID WILLIAMS WIRE, Esq. in the Chair;

It was resolved, upon the motion of Mr. Goddard, seconded by Mr. Lewis Frampton;

That all attorneys and solicitors beside being compelled to serve a clerkship of five years are obliged to pay heavy duties and other fees both on their articles and admissions, and also a considerable annual stamp duty for liberty to practice—that such duties were imposed by the Legislature for the purpose of ensuring the respectability of the Profession by keeping the practice of the law in the hands of properly educated and responsible persons; and that it is essentially for the benefit of the public at large that none but persons duly qualified should be allowed to practice in any of the Courts of Law, Equity, or Bankruptcy.

Resolved, upon the motion of Mr. Fynmore, seconded by Mr. Fitch;

That it is notorious that various unqualified persons, under the pretence of being clerks or agents to attorneys or solicitors, are in the habit of practising as attorneys both in the Courts of Law and Bankruptcy, to the great detriment and injury of the qualified practitioner, and in defiance of various Acts of Parliament which impose heavy penalties on all parties so offending.

Resolved, upon the motion of Mr. Watson, seconded by Mr. Blake;

That, in order to protect the rights and privileges of the Profession against such unjust and illegal interference, and to prosecute and punish the same in all cases where it can be satisfactorily detected, and to assist in obtaining all useful and practical reforms and amendments of the law, it is expedient that an association of the attorneys-at-law and solicitors of the United Kingdom be forthwith formed, this Meeting being decidedly of opinion that such an association will insure an honourable and liberal course of practice in the Profession, and confer an important benefit on the community at large.

Resolved, upon the motion of Mr. Townsend, seconded by Mr. Clarke;

That such association be, and the same is, hereby accordingly formed, and that every qualified member of the Profession who shall signify such his desire in writing be, and he is hereby admitted, a member of the association, and that the expenses of maintaining and carrying out the objects of the same be defrayed by an annual subscription of one guinea from each member.

Resolved, upon the motion of Mr. Turner, seconded by Mr. Fitch;

That an interim Committee, consisting of twelve persons —viz. Mr. Bolton, Mr. Blake, Mr. Fynmore, Mr. Fitch, Mr. Goddard, Mr. Surr, Mr. Turner, Mr. Townsend, Mr. Wire, Mr. Watson, jun. Mr. Wedlake, and Mr. Wright—be now appointed to draw up such rules and regulations as they shall seem advisable for the government of the association, and to submit the same for adoption to a general meeting of the members to be held as soon as the regulations are prepared; that at such general meeting a Committee of Management for the ensuing year, also a Secretary, and such other officers as may be deemed necessary, and that in the meantime Mr. Edward Clarke, of No. 5, Bedford-row, be requested to act as Honorary Secretary.

D. W. WIRE, Chairman.

Upon the motion of Mr. Goddard, seconded by Mr. Fynmore:

It was resolved, That the cordial thanks of this Meeting be given to Mr. Wire for his able conduct in the chair this day.

YORKSHIRE.—The Crathorne Estate, in the North Riding of the county of York.

MESSRS. RUSHWORTH and JARVIS will SELL by AUCTION, at the George Hotel, in York, on Wednesday, October 23, at Two in the afternoon, a most valuable and important MANORIAL FAMILY DOMAIN known as the Crathorne Estate, lying in Cleveland, in the North Riding of Yorkshire, possessed by the family of Crathorne for many centuries, and now for the first time offered to public competition; comprising about 2,200 acres of rich land embedded in varied and beautiful woods, on eminences and amidst vallies through which the romantic river Leven gracefully winds for more than three miles, forming a magnificent amphitheatre of wood, and presenting with the majestic Cleveland hills in the distance a most perfect and delightful series of the picturesque, and offering an unequalled locale for a mansion, which would combine the richest with the most sublime varieties of nature and the associations of centuries with every modern luxury of a country life, the game of the moors, the woods and the stubbles being rivalled in abundance only by the trout and finny tribes of the stream, and the Cleveland, Hambleton, and Hurworth hunts filling up the sphere of enjoyment. This noble freehold estate comprises nearly the whole of the township of Crathorne, whilst to perfect the proprietary rights the baronial manor of Crathorne, with the courts and powers attached, and the advowson of the rectory of Crathorne, form part of the domain. The estate is admirably compact, and divided into most convenient farms, with excellent homesteads in good repair. It is well cultivated by substantial tenants at a very moderate rental of upwards of 2,500*l.* exclusive of woodland, and the soil is such as to present an opportunity by a judicious outlay of greatly enlarging the income and adding to its productiveness. The timber is chiefly oak and ash, covering the banks of the Leven, and ornamenting the entire estate. Besides these detached groups, 143 acres of wood, in the hands of the owner, offer the means of raising capital at pleasure. For the more convenient cultivation of the estate thirty-five well-built cottage houses afford comfortable accommodation to the labourers, and supply the wants of the farms. On the river stands an excellent water corn-mill, with an eighteen feet fall, which works a thrashing machine, and has most extensive granaries attached. The advowson is of the value of upwards of 270*l.* a year, with an excellent rectory-house. The population of the parish is about 300, and the age of the incumbent 57. The tithes of the township of Crathorne are in course of commutation; a small portion (eighty-one acres) extends into the parish of Kirkleavington, the tithe of which is held under a renewable lease. The past payment for Crathorne tithe has been about 46*l.* per annum, and a small fee-farm rent of 20*s.* is payable in Kirkleavington. Crathorne is situate within four miles of the Darlington and Stockton Railway at Yarm, and within ten miles of the Great North of England Railway at Northallerton. It is sixteen miles distant from Thirsk, thirty-five from York, and twenty-five from the coast of Redcar. The estate and the advowson will be put up in separate lots.

Plans and printed particulars will be shortly published, and may be had at the principal hotels. Leave to view the estate may be obtained of Mr. Paver, Land Agent, Peckfield, Ferrybridge; at the Auctioneer's offices, Saville-row, Regent-street, and 19, Change-alley, Cornhill; or of Messrs. BAXTER, Solicitors, Doncaster.

CLERKS OF PETTY SESSIONS BILL.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

SIR,—Permit me, through the columns of your valuable journal, to call the attention of your numerous readers to the fifth clause of the above Bill, which enacts as follows: "That no person shall be eligible for the office of clerk of petty sessions who shall not have been admitted an attorney of one of her Majesty's superior Courts of Common Law for five years at the least before such election, unless in the case of any person who shall have acted as clerk to the justices of any division before the passing of this Act, whom the justices present at the election, or the greater number of them, shall certify under their hands to be sufficiently qualified by experience and knowledge of the law to perform the duties of clerk of petty sessions."

Now, as regards the prohibiting any person (except as is excepted) from being eligible to the office of clerk of petty sessions, unless such person is an admitted attorney, I see no room for complaint; for I think that the important duties of that office, and the assistance and advice which country magistrates generally look for from their clerk, require that some respectable attorney should be elected to the office; but at the same time, to say that, at the present day a young man who has served a clerkship of five long years (yea, generally seven) in an attorney's office, read extensively during that period, and made himself acquainted with the general routine of business, probably studied some five or six months in addition under the careful eye of an equity draftsman or special pleader, and, lastly, passed the ordeal of the examiner, is not fit and capable to discharge the functions of clerk of petty sessions, is really absurd. But this is not all that may be said as respects the restriction; it will be attended with an inconvenience which at once justifies the five years being struck out.

I allude to those divisions (and there are many in Wales) where attorneys of five years standing cannot be found residing sufficiently near enough to make it suit them to take the office, and indeed it would, in such a case, be highly improper and inconvenient for magistrates to have their clerk residing at a distance from the district in which his services would be required—what then, in such a case, are magistrates to do? Why, they must leave the business of the division undone, or be without a clerk and discharge the duties themselves.

Having made these few remarks, I trust some of your readers will take the matter up, and shew more ably the necessity of the five years restriction being struck out of the clause.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,
EMBRYO.

ATTENDANCE OF ATTORNEYS' CLERKS BEFORE THE MAGISTRATES.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

SIR,—The Profession cannot but feel much indebted for the report of the case at the "Hatton-garden Police-office" which appeared in your inestimable publication of Saturday last, respecting the right of attorneys' authorized clerks to appear before the magistrates; and I think you will confer a great benefit on the Profession by inducing one of your numerous correspondents to furnish some information on the questioned practice; and, in my humble opinion, the conduct of Mr. Coombes, the magistrate, deserves the unqualified approbation of the Profession, as exhibiting a feeling of liberality towards attorneys which they are not prone to manifest to each other.

The practice objected to is, I believe, universally permitted in every part of the kingdom, including Wales.

Of my own experience, which is somewhat large, I can state that I have (being thereunto authorized) attended before the judges, before the magistrates in town and country, before various under-sheriffs, and before the bankruptcy commissioners, as the representative of a solicitor, without objection; and should Mr. Horry feel zealously anxious to try the question in order to take the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench as threatened, I shall be happy to become his victim, should he be unable to find another "willing sacrifice."

I remain, Mr. Editor,
Your obedient servant,
A SOLICITOR'S MANAGING CLERK.

THE NEW REGULATION OF THE INNS OF COURT.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

SIR,—Permit me (in conformity with your liberal and acceptable plan of inviting discussion on important matters), through the medium of your columns, to join with your correspondent "A Country Solicitor," in condemnation of that most iniquitous order which has been recently issued by the Benchers of the Inner Temple, and, I believe, of the other Inns of Court, precluding all who are in practice as attornies, or who act as clerks, articled or otherwise, from keeping terms for the Bar during the continuance of their practice or clerkship. I confess I think that this attempt should not be suffered to be made to crush and degrade the inferior branch of the Profession, without calling forth severe notice and rebuke from every aspirant after its honours.

Are the Benchers so ashamed of the Hardwickes, the Kenyons, the Mansfields (Sir James Mansfield), and the Wildes of the laws, that they must needs contrive subtle schemes for excluding all such men from the Profession in time to come?(a) What do they propose to gain by such a regulation? Is it to ensure respectability in the members of the Bar? I have yet to learn that the persons I have mentioned brought any disgrace upon the Profession of which they were the glory. In truth, these gentlemen, in the excess of their ardour to keep the Profession select, seem to have adopted one of the best possible means to rob it of its talent and deprive it of its industry. Surely it can never be pleaded in defence of so scandalous and exclusive a rule, that it is likely to keep out inferior men!

Is it not now almost universally admitted—has it not been publicly declared by lawyers now living, the most eminent in their profession, that the best school for the barrister at the commencement of his labours, is the office of the attorney? Have not judges the most illustrious, openly stated that if they had to begin their course of study over again they would commence it at the attorney's desk?

It is said that the regulation will prevent us from having a set of poor and needy competitors in the race to legal renown! The Benchers seem to have forgotten that it has been the opinion of those who were best qualified to judge, that narrow and contracted means were, above all things, favourable to the diligent, laborious, and successful pursuit of the law. Let them read the statements of Lord Kenyon on this head. Upon the whole, this order seems as if expressly intended to debar the profession of the services and talents of a set of persons pre-eminently qualified by their habits of industry, their talents, and their experience, to do honour to and adorn it.

I am, Sir, your most obedient servant,
JEREMIAH GILL.

Birmingham, September 4, 1844.

(a) Query, did they practise as attorneys up to the moment of being called? It is this only which the regulations prevent.

TRANSFER OF PROPERTY ACT.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

SIR,—I presume the object of this statute, so far as it relates to mortgages, was intended to benefit the mortgagor by removing the doubt whether the legal estate passed by the mortgagee's will or went to his heir, and also to obviate the expense of obtaining a conveyance from an infant. Upon perusing the Act, it appeared to me that, in addition to the proof that will be required in support of the facts necessary to bring a case within its provisions, the Act is inefficient to effect the object intended.

To bring a case within the Act, possession of the land must not have been taken under the mortgage—no suit or action must be pending—and the principal and interest-money due must be paid. It frequently happens that possession of a mortgaged property is taken, even where the value thereof will exceed the principal and interest due, and this case, on account of the first requisite, is not within the statute consequently not beneficial to the mortgagor; but a greater hardship, and to which my attention was more particularly called, is under the third requisite, where it appears to me legislative aid was most needed, viz. in a case where the legal fee, in a property mortgaged above its value, is outstanding in an infant heir—and how many cases are there where property is so mortgaged, particularly in large towns, where the value of property fluctuates so much by the occurrence of circumstances not within the control of a mortgagee? A property to-day may afford an ample security, and yet by the erection of other property (and before he can obtain his money) in a more desirable locality; or by the erection of premises contiguous to the property mortgaged, may render the latter an insufficient security; and because the whole of the principal and interest money cannot be recovered, both the mortgagor and the personal representative of the mortgagee are alike deprived of the remedy proposed, and must still resort to a court of equity for a conveyance of the legal estate. In short, the Act seems to me to favour only such mortgagors as are able to pay; or, where possession has not been taken of their property, it will yield the principal and interest money due; the poor mortgagor must have recourse to that expensive remedy, which, I presume, furnished a ground of complaint, and induced the alteration of the law to the extent above referred to. If I should be wrong in this view, some of your numerous correspondents will, perhaps, be so good as to put me right.

I remain, Sir, yours most obediently,
J. WATKINS.

ADMISSION TO THE OLD BAILEY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

MR. EDITOR,—The remarks of various correspondents in the daily papers, and particularly of a correspondent in The Times, subscribing himself "What Next," upon the subject of the regulations for admission at the Old Bailey, are very judicious. No system can be surely more reprehensible than that which converts a court of justice into a spectacle to be exhibited at half-a-crown a head; and I am surprised that the respectable persons who now exercise the functions of sheriffs, and their learned subalterns, the undersheriffs (who are usually selected from the élite of the members of the Common Council of London), should sanction such a proceeding. At the same time it must be observed, that an indiscriminate admission of the multitude would cause much confusion, particularly as the absurd course of blocking up one of the galleries at the very period when the throwing open the jurisdiction to the home counties required additional space for the public, has circumscribed that space to a very narrow limit.

I would suggest the following regulation for the admission of the public. There is a class of persons whose duties at the Old Bailey are of a very onerous and responsible character, who not only receive no remuneration for the performance of such duties, but undergo great privations. I allude to those persons exercising the all-important functions of the petit jury. These respectable individuals, upon whose voices depend the destinies of so many of their fellow-subjects, are not only compelled to leave their business to chance,—banished from their homes and families, —but uninvited to the gastronomical spread in the upper regions of the Old Bailey (so celebrated by Theodore Hook in his memorable description in Gilbert Gurney of an Old Bailey dinner), are ofttimes kept without meat, drink, fire, and candle. Surely it would be no injudicious exercise of patronage if, as some reward for the laborious duties required of them by their country, they should be furnished with tickets of admission to the gallery of the Old Bailey, whereby their friends might be admitted, under proper regulations, and to the extent that the small space will accommodate. The present repulsive and justly reprehensible mode of admission would thus at once be got rid of.

But there is another class of persons who have complained, and with reason, of the injudicious regulations at the Old Bailey. I allude to the solicitors engaged in the trials at the court, and to whom the determined system of exclusion is a great annoyance.

During a practice of twenty years, it has been my chance to be engaged but in two or three prosecutions at this place; and from the treatment I have experienced there I do not covet a profusion of the practice; although never disposed to be driven by the insolence of office from doing my duty to my client under all circumstances.

At the Easter sessions I was engaged in a prosecution of an extensive robbery of a large wholesale house. It happened (unfortunately for me) to be during the progress of what a facetious barrister has called "Show Trials"—the notorious Barber and Fletcher were being tried, and admission was at a premium. I had the greatest difficulty to get in at all. Being compelled to leave the court a short time before my trial came on, I was returning with one of the prosecutors (a member of a leading and respectable city firm), when we were repulsed with much rudeness by one of the City police, because we were not favoured by an order from one of the undersheriffs. The urgency of the case compelled us to seek an entry by a back way, under the wing of another policeman, who was one of our witnesses for the prosecution.

Surely it is not under such auspices as these that a solicitor of respectability and standing is to be compelled to seek an entry into a court of justice where he has a cause at issue. Nor should he be driven to bow and cringe to undersheriffs or other officials to incur an implied obligation for that which is his acknowledged right.

The remedy for this evil is equally easy. Let the clerk of the arraigns issue tickets for the authorized solicitors in each case, that would insure their admission, and prevent their being thrust from the door by officials of any grade.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,
THOMAS LOTT.

LEASES OF MORTGAGED PREMISES.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

SIR,—The remarks of a "Constant Reader" appear to be quite beside the question put by Mr. Robert Leigh, which was, as I understood it, "What is the practice with regard to the preparation of Leases of Mortgaged Premises?" and not whether that practice be expedient or inexpedient, just or unjust?

The inconveniences and hardships which he suggests are imaginary, and are not felt in practice; and I therefore think it unnecessary to trouble you with replies to his queries.

Yours, &c.

STAMPS ON AGREEMENTS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

SIR,—Will you or any of your correspondents be so good as to state for my practical information what stamps should be affixed to an agreement of twenty-five folios? the Act 55 Geo. 3, c. 184, extending to schedules, whilst the recent statute, 7 Vict. c. 21, is not so clear.

Yours obediently,
A SUBSCRIBER.

PRACTICE AMONG MAGISTRATES' CLERKS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

SIR,—Permit me to call the attention of your readers to a point of practice adopted by some attorneys, clerks to justices in Devonshire.

The practice to which I refer is, that the clerks to justices, in cases of making orders for the removal of paupers to their place of settlement, insist on retaining the examinations on which the orders are made and also the documentary evidence (if any), such as indentures of apprenticeship, prior orders of removal, &c. until after the sessions next following the making the orders, or in the event of appeals, until such appeals are heard and determined.

I submit that this practice is not only unjust towards the members of the Profession, but detrimental to the interests of our clients. By the 79th section of the Poor Law Amendment Act, the overseers or guardians of the parish obtaining an order of removal are required to send copies of the examinations on which the order was made, a counterpart of the order, and a notice of pauper's chargeability, to the overseers of the parish to whom such order shall be directed; and true and correct copies of all examinations and depositions taken before the justices preliminary to their granting the order, whether the evidence they contain be relevant or not, must be sent, or the order on appeal will be quashed, and thus the respondent parish burdened with the future maintenance of the paupers and costs of the appeal.

Now, it is almost the invariable usage for parishes seeking to remove paupers to their place of settlement, to employ an attorney to take the examinations and conduct the application for the order (and late decisions have shewn with what particularity and care such examinations must be prepared). The attorney so employed is therefore held answerable by his clients to see the requirements of the Act strictly complied with; but by the practice above referred to, he is stopped at the very first step in his duty subsequent to obtaining the order; he cannot send copies of the examinations or counterpart of the order of removal, for they are retained by the justices' clerk, who claims the right to make and send the copies, and his fees for so doing; this is certainly in direct opposition to the intention of the framers of the Act, for instead of directing the justices or their clerk to send the copies, the Act directs the overseers or guardians to do so.

The work of copying the examinations, the comparing the copies with the originals, and the sending them, with the other needful documents, is then intrusted, not unfrequently, to the justices' clerk's clerk, and still the attorney for the parish officers must bear the responsibility and the blame if the requirements of the Act are not complied with.

But the evil does not end here. Suppose the order be appealed against, the respondent parish has to bear the costs of the justices' clerk, an attorney, attending the sessions, probably for several days, and in most cases, at a distance from his home, in order first to produce the original examinations, and then to prove the sending examined copies of them to the overseers of the appellant parish.

It frequently happens that the clerk to the justices is the attorney for the parish to which the order is directed; he must either be intrusted with the duty of sending the copies of examinations, &c. to his own clients, or the attorney for the parish obtaining the order, having a prudent regard for the interests of his clients, as well as his own professional reputation, must attend on the justices' clerk, who probably lives at a distance, when the copies of examinations shall have been prepared by him, in order to compare them with the originals and send them to the overseers, as the Act requires.

My opinion is, that the examinations and orders when made are the property of the parish at whose instance they were obtained; for it is the duty of the parish officers to deposit them in the parish chest for future reference and evidence. But I have found it useless to attempt to induce justices to be of this opinion; for, in matters of practice, justices are generally, and perhaps properly, guided by the advice and opinion of their clerk.

Your obedient servant,
Exeter, Sept. 3, 1844. JAMES PITTS.

SELECTIONS FROM CORRESPONDENCE.

An Attorney's Clerk (Oldham), after giving an instance of the usual consequences of a person knowing a litt of law affecting to draw a will, observes:—

"That a person should have a right to prepare his own will may be well conceded by the Profession, though many parties would have been materially benefited if that had not been the case; but that parties utterly unacquainted with even the most common modes of disposition should be permitted to draw wills and make charges for their handiwork, is a lamentable deficiency in the protective law of this country, and a manifest injustice to the Profession at large. There is now an illiterate man, altogether incompetent to the task, who resides at Failsworth, near Manchester, who prepares the wills of all the noodles who surround him, and there are more noodles than wise men in his and all other neighbourhoods. What may be the effect of this in future years no man can tell; but the effect of this practice at present is to deprive the man who has prepared himself at a great expense and much labour to perform effectively the duties of his Profession from being employed by parties wanting his assistance, and whose place it is ten to one the parties employed cannot properly fulfil, to the injury of the family and friend of their employers. Can nothing be done to remedy this crying evil?

DRUNKENNESS.

A return has been made on this subject, which cannot fail to excite interest, as it is one which is, in a statistical point of view, illustrative to a certain extent of the moral condition of the people of this vast metropolis. The returns moved for by Mr. Hume were "of the number of persons taken into custody for drunkenness, and for disorderly conduct, by the metropolitan police, in each year from 1831 to 1843, both inclusive, distinguishing each, and stating the population of the metropolitan police district in the years 1831 and 1843; and a similar return for the city of London."

From this document we glean the following singular results:—The maximum amount of persons taken into custody for drunkenness is to be found in the years 1831, 1832, and 1833, and the minimum in 1843.

In 1831 they were, males and females		..	31,353
1833	ditto	ditto	29,880

Taking the population according to the census of 1831 at 1,515,585, then the number of persons taken into custody for drunkenness was in these periods respectively as about 2 1-15th, 2 1-7th, and 1½ and a fraction out of every 100. In 1843 the number of persons taken into custody for drunkenness fell to 10,890, which, taking the census of 1841, say 2,068,107, was in the proportion of little more than ½ in every 100. In the city of London, also, the same gratifying result is shown. In 1840 the numbers were 5113, which, on the estimated population of 124,876, was in the enormous proportion of full 4 1-10th out of every 100. In 1843 the numbers were 2,595, which, taking the official estimated population at 125,273, was in the ratio of 2½ to every 100. Let us hope from these facts that temperance is becoming more general among the labouring classes of the metropolis. Its beneficial influence on the social condition of the people must be evident to every man.

ARMY PRIZE MONEY.

The following Parliamentary return, published yesterday, exhibits the account of unclaimed army prize-money (formerly made by the deputy treasurer of the Royal Hospital at Chelsea), from the 18th January, 1809, to the 31st December, 1843, directed to be annually laid before the Houses of Parliament by the Act 2 Wm. 4, c. 53:—

Dr.
To cash arising from forfeited and unclaimed shares of prize-money, grants, &c.	£1,075,122 19 11
To ditto arising from the dividends or interest of moneys invested in the public funds, or other Government securities . . .	218,147 10 4

Cr.
By cash refunded to claimants .	£655,342 18 0¼
By expense in executing acts from the 18th Jan. 1809, to the 31st Dec. 1843	57,548 5 0½
By sums paid for the Royal Hospital, in diminution of the annual vote	561,663 8 0¾
Balance (vide Memorandum below)	18,715 19 0¼
	£1,293,273 10 3

Memorandum.—Although the balance upon the account appears to be as above stated, yet there is in the Three per Cent. Consols 100,000*l*. stock, and in the Bank of England, to the account of the Paymaster-General, 15,638*l*. 17s. 9d. which arises from the investments having been made in the earliest periods, when the funds were very low, and from the amount sold thereout from time to time having been when the prices of stock were considerably higher; thus accounting for the difference between the balance as stated, and the present amount of the army prize fund in the Three per Cent. Consols, and in money at the Bank of England.

(Signed) RICH. NEAVE, Secretary.
Royal Hospital, Chelsea, August, 1844.

JOURNAL OF PROPERTY.

THE MONEY MARKET.

FRIDAY.—Consols closed at 99⅞ sellers for present Transfer, and buyers at about that rate for Account.

The Foreign Securities also exhibited rather a dull appearance. Spanish Actives were 23⅞ to 23¾; the Three per Cents. 34¾ to 34⅞; Portuguese Converted, 46 to 46½; and Mexican, 35¾ to 35⅞ for the Actives, and 15½ for the Deferred.

The transactions in Railway Shares have been: Bristol and Gloucester, 12 to 10½; Chester and Holyhead, 1⅞; Dublin and Cashel, 8¾ to 9½; Great Western, 75¾; Ditto, Half, 38¾; Ditto, Fifths, 14⅞; Hull and Selby, 18 to 19; Birmingham, Thirds, 34½; Greenwich Preference, 4½ to 4⅞; Croydon, 3¾; London and York, 3 to 2⅞; Midland, 7¼ to 7⅞; Norwich and Brandon, 9½ to 9; South Devon, 5; South-Eastern, 6⅛ to 6⅞; Ditto, New, 9½ to 9; Trent Valley, 6½; Yarmouth and Norwich, 9; York and North Midland, 57; Orleans, Tours, and Bordeaux, 1; Paris and Orleans, 18⅞ to 18⅞; and Paris and Rouen, 18⅞ premium. Caledonian have been ⅞; Eastern Counties, 12 to 11⅞; Brighton, 3¼ to 4¼; and Greenwich, 3½ to 2¾ discount. Provincial Bank of Ireland shares were 19¼ premium.

NEW THREE-AND-A-HALF PER CENTS.—As some misunderstanding seems to have arisen with respect to a recent act of Parliament (7th and 8th Victoria, cap. 39) exempting from the payment of income tax a portion of the dividends on the New Three-and-a-Half per Cents., it may be stated that this act applies to the New Three-and-a-Half per Cents. only, and not to the Reduced. The income-tax first came into operation on the 5th of April, 1842, and the dividends on the New Three-and-a-Half per Cents. due on the 5th of July, were charged with six months' tax, although no more than three months had elapsed. This overcharge would have been rectified on the cessation of the income tax had no financial alterations taken place, for the portion of dividend accruing between January and April would have been exempt from duty altogether. Since the conversion of the Three-and-a-Half per Cents. generally the Government, liberally enough, have at once given back the holders of the New Three-and-a-Half per Cents. the overpaid tax, by exempting from taxation the quarter's dividend that will be payable on the 10th of October next. As the dividends on Reduced Three-and-a-Half per Cents. have always been payable in April and October, they did not pay any extra tax, and consequently there is nothing to return to the holders of this stock. It is certainly incorrect to call the concession made by the Act a "bonus," as in fact it is only an allowance for an over-payment made at a previous period.

In 1841, the Company declared an addition to the Shareholders of one-half of their Stock, and also added a Bonus of 2*l.* per cent. per annum on the sum insured to all policies of the participating class from the time they were effected.

ARCHBOLD'S PRACTICE of the CROWN OFFICE of the COURT of QUEEN'S BENCH, with Forms of all the Pleadings, Rules, Notices, &c. which occur in Practice. By J. F. ARCHBOLD, Esq. Barrister-at-Law. 1 vol. 12mo. price 12s. boards.

"To the country attorney this work must be of great importance; so many orders, convictions, indictments, are now removed by certiorari, and so many and such serious mistakes are made in the practice of removing them, that it must be desirable to them to have a work which will relieve them of the odium and blame they incur from their clients, for the delay, and the costs, and oftentimes the failure altogether, which such mistakes occasion."

FIFTY POUNDS REWARD.—The hard substance obtained by pressure from the crude Cocoa-Nut Oil is an essential ingredient in the PATENT COMPOSITE CANDLES; and, as EDWARD PRICE and CO. hold the Patents for this process, and grant no licenses under them, it follows, either that the imitation Composite Candles are entirely different from the patent ones, or, that the imitators are infringing the patents: the first is generally the case, but to protect themselves against the possibility of the other, EDWARD PRICE and CO. hereby engage to pay a reward of Fifty Pounds to any workman or other person who may give such information respecting parties pressing Cocoa-Nut Oil, as shall lead to their conviction. The name of the informant will be kept strictly secret, and he need not take a prominent part in the proceedings, as all that E. P. and Co. require, is the first clue to the discovery of the infringers, which they will then follow up for themselves. This advertisement is being published in every newspaper of any circulation in the United Kingdom.

The Candles are now so well known to the public, that it is hardly necessary to state here that they burn more brilliantly than the best wax, and give so large an amount of light, as to be cheaper, taking this into account, than the commonest tallow candles. They may be had of most of the respectable dealers throughout the kingdom; but purchasers must insist on being supplied with "PRICE'S PATENT CANDLES," otherwise they are liable to be deceived with some of the imitations, all called, like the real ones, "Composite." Those parties really in the trade, who do not yet keep them for sale, are informed that they can purchase of the Patentees, or of Palmer and Co. Sutton-street, Clerkenwell, any quantity, large or small, at the wholesale price; and that allowances are made in an increasing ratio to parties taking to the amount of 50*l.* 100*l.* 150*l.* or 200*l.* at a time; and a very large allowance indeed to parties taking so large a quantity as to enable them to become wholesale agents for an entire district.

Belmont, Vauxhall, July 24th, 1844.

MR. CLARKE'S ENAMELLED SUCCEDANEUM, for stopping decayed Teeth, is far superior to any thing ever before used, as it is placed in the tooth without any pressure or pain, and becomes as hard as the enamel, immediately after application, and remains firm in the tooth for life, rendering extraction unnecessary, and renders them again useful for mastication. Prepared only by Mr. Clarke, Surgeon Dentist.

LOSS OF TEETH.

Mr. CLARKE still continues to supply the loss of teeth, from one to a complete set, upon his beautiful system of self-adhesion, which has procured him such universal approbation in some thousands of cases, and recommended by numerous physicians and surgeons, as being the most ingenious system of supplying artificial teeth hitherto invented. They are so contrived as to adapt themselves over the most tender gums or remaining stumps, without causing the least pain, rendering the operation of extraction quite unnecessary. They are so fixed as to fasten any loose teeth, by forming a new gum, where the gums have shrunk, from the use of mercury or other causes, without the aid of any wire or springs, and above all, are firmer in the mouth, and fixed with that attention to nature as to defy detection by the closest observer. He also begs to invite those not liking to undergo any painful operation, as practised by most members of the profession, to inspect his painless, yet effective system, where numerous sets and partial sets, in all stages of progress, may be seen; and in order that his system may be within the reach of the most economical, he will continue the same moderate charges.

Mr. CLARKE, Surgeon Dentist, at home from Ten till Five, No. 6, Thayer-street, Manchester-square.

JOURNAL OF PROPERTY.

THE MONEY MARKET.

FRIDAY.—The English Securities opened firmly this morning, but the business doing is very small. Consols for immediate transfer have been $99\frac{5}{8}$ to $99\frac{3}{4}$, and for time $99\frac{3}{4}$ $\frac{7}{8}$; Exchequer Bills have been at the premium of 76s. to 74s.; the East India Bonds are 92s. premium; Bank Stock for Account is 207 to $207\frac{1}{2}$, and India Stock realizes $284\frac{1}{2}$. The Commissioners gave $99\frac{3}{4}$ for Consols.

The Spanish Bonds have been flat again, the Five per Cents. at $23\frac{5}{8}$, and the Three per Cents. at $34\frac{1}{4}$ to $\frac{1}{2}$, the Passive Stock has been $5\frac{7}{8}$, and the Deferred $13\frac{1}{8}$ to $\frac{1}{4}$. Mexican Bonds have rallied a little from yesterday's depression, and are $36\frac{1}{4}$ for the Actives.

The Share investments still present a dull appearance, relatively to the activity which prevailed a week or two back. Even the new lines have this morning been in less demand, though some of them continue at high rates. Trent Valley are 8 to $7\frac{1}{2}$; South Devon 4 to $4\frac{1}{4}$, and London and York $2\frac{1}{4}$ to $2\frac{1}{2}$ premium. Birmingham have been low at 13 premium, and Brighton 3 discount.

MR CLARKE'S ENAMELLED SUCCEDANEUM, for stopping decayed Teeth, is far superior to any thing ever before used as it is placed in the tooth without any pressure or pain and becomes as hard as the enamel, immediately after application and remains firm in the tooth for life, rendering extraction unnecessary and renders them again useful for mastication Prepared only by Mr Clarke, Surgeon Dentist
Mr CLARKE still continues to supply the loss of teeth, from one to a complete set, upon his beautiful system of self adhesion, which has procured him such universal approbation in some thousands of cases, and recommended by numerous physicians and surgeons, as being the most ingenious system of supplying artificial teeth hitherto invented. They are so contrived as to adapt themselves over the most tender gums or remaining stumps, without causing the least pain, rendering the operation of extraction quite unnecessary They are so fixed as to fasten any loose teeth, by forming a new gum, where the gums have shrunk, from the use of mercury or other causes, without the aid of any wire or springs, and above all, are firmer in the mouth, and fixed with that attention to nature as to defy detection by the closest observer He also begs to invite those not liking to undergo any painful operation, as practised by most members of the profession, to inspect his painless, yet effective, system, where numerous sets and partial sets, in all stages of progress, may be seen, and in order that his system may be within the reach of the most economical, he will continue the same moderate charges
Mr CLARKE, Surgeon-Dentist, at home from Ten till Five No 6, Thayer-street, Manchester-square
